In order to estimate the importance of this decline in values, and ascertain the extent of the damage to agriculture, we must multiply the unit of price of each product by the total production for the year. We thus reach the alarming conclusion that in fifteen years the total receipts of agriculture fell half a billion of francs.

I ask you, gentlemen, what industry could face such a situation without drifting into bankruptcy? It needed all the courage, the thrift, the industry, and, I may add, the invincible attachment of our farmers to the soil to enable them to confront so desperate a condition.

I have shown that the crisis through which we are passing is almost without precedent. It is true there can be found in all epochs periods of decline in the value of land produce. From all time there have been crises in the agricultural interest; but they have always, or almost always, been partial and transitory; they affected a limited number of articles and were of short duration. For the first time, I believe, the world witnesses a prolonged crisis affecting all agricultural products.

Having disclosed one, although but a secondary, cause of the evil, let us endeavor to trace out the primary cause, the true source of this phenomenal and unparalleled decline.

This is the second question to be investigated.

A patient study of the various influences which have contributed to produce this decline of values reveals the fact that it does not flow from one source alone. Nothing can be more dangerous in such investigations than to attempt the forcing of results to fit preconceived theories. Without doubt, there are several factors to be considered, and I shall endeavor to briefly outline them.

The first to force itself upon our attention, by reason of its magnitude, is, unquestionably, the evolution—I should say the revolution—in modes of transportation during the last twenty years. The multiplicity of its forms and the rapidity and cheapness of transportation have effected an inevitable reduction in the prices of produce. Formerly distance was a barrier; to-day that barrier has disappeared. All markets are brought within such easy communication that they may be regarded, for practical purposes, as one great general market, and in consequence prices have, by the natural law, found their lowest level. Those countries which can produce most cheaply to-day, unfortunately, fix the rates for all others. This is an undeniable fact.

At the present moment it costs less to carry a ton of wheat from New York to Havre than from Paris to Marseilles. It was inevitable that this annihilation of space should result in a diminution of prices.

Does this cause alone suffice to explain the general decline which I have pointed out? For my part, I do not think so, and for two reasons.

In the first place, this cause is only applicable to those products which I will call international exchanges. With regard to the main products which circulate from one end of the world to the other, such as wheat, for instance, it is certain that prices have been considerably affected by the reduction in the cost of transportation; but this can not be said of the immense variety of local products which do not cross the boundaries of the country, which compete only the one with the other, and which are scarcely touched by foreign competition. It is a fact that these local crops have been involved in the general depression.

Mr. JAURÈS. What are these local crops?

Mr. MÉLINE. I beg that you will allow me to proceed without interruption.

Mr. JAURÈS. We simply ask what are these local crops which are not touched by foreign competition.

Mr. MÉLINE. Is the potato affected by international competition? No; and yet domestic competition does touch it.

There is a second reason which prevents our attributing a decisive influence to the reduction in transportation; it is, that prices have continued to fall during several years, although freight rates remained unchanged. We have seen a marked diminution in the cost of transportation, but this has come to a halt. It is apparent that the fall in agricultural products, on the contrary, is unchecked.

We must therefore seek elsewhere, and seeking we have found. We at once discover another cause, one well known in the industrial world, where it plays an important part, and which is called overproduction. The inquiry has been made whether it was to overproduction that was due this depreciation in all produce. There is no doubt that it has greatly contributed thereto, although it is here of less importance than in the case of manufactures, since the mode of production is essentially different. In manufactures production may be extended indefinitely; factories may be built without limit; machinery is perfected from day to day, and in proportion to the improvements made is the increase in production. Mother Earth performs no such wonders; her surface is limited, and she can not multiply her returns beyond the boundaries fixed by nature. Agricultural overproduction, therefore, does not bring about the same results as industrial overproduction.

However, I will not deny that with a certain number of agricultural products, more especially in the case of those which undergo an intermediate process of transformation, and pass from the farm to the factory before reaching the consumer, overproduction has made itself felt. There is no doubt, for instance, that overproduction has influenced the price of sugars and alcohols. But with the exception of the articles named, overproduction does not furnish a satisfactory explanation of the phenomenon we are investigating.

This is above all true with regard to wheat. English statisticians have mathematically demonstrated, by a careful analysis of the annual harvests of the entire world, that, although it is indisputable that the general production of wheat has greatly increased, it has not augmented in proportion to the expansion of population. So true is this that, far from there being an overproduction of wheat, there is rather a shortage. We can not, therefore, account for the decline in an international product such as wheat by the theory of overproduction. Assigning their just relative value to each of the two factors I have heretofore indicated, namely, the cheapening of transportation and overproduction, is there not, then, still another cause which is worthy of our notice?

It is impossible to pass over in silence an important fact which I will now bring to the attention of this House, and which I believe is incontestable. It has been observed that in those countries which use only silver as a monetary standard the products of agriculture and manufacture retained their value in money, while, on the other hand, in countries having a gold standard the same articles have fallen 50 per cent.

This, gentlemen, is a fact of such importance as to deserve a few moments' consideration. It is affirmed by the highest and most unimpeachable authorities.

The British Government in 1887 appointed a high commission to investigate this question and make a report on the subject of the monetary standard, viewed from the economic standpoint. I would wish to avoid quotations on so arid a subject, but you will permit me to cite the conclusions of this commission, which are embraced in a few lines and are decisive.

Here is what the gold and silver commission says:

"At the same time with the decline in the price of silver in gold a general fall of prices in gold took place in England, which has a gold standard, while in India the rupee retained its purchasing power and prices in silver remained stationary. This shows that the value of silver itself has not fallen, although it has greatly declined in relation to gold. This brings about two results favorable to India and unfavorable to England, at least until prices find their level. Cultivation in India is favored at the expense of the wheat grower in England, and in the same way the Indian manufacturer is favored at the expense of English manufacturers.

"The English manufacturer suffers through the exchange. As to the English farmer, he sells his wheat cheaper, in proportion, than the ryot, because the price remains the same in India, while it has fallen in England. In India, a silver country, prices remain stationary; in England, a gold country, prices fall."

These conclusions, arrived at by the high commission appointed by the British Government, have since been formally confirmed by the reports both of the British and French consuls. The same thesis was notably maintained by Mr. Jamieson, British consul-general at Shanghai, in his well-known pamphlet on the silver question in Europe and Asia. Our own consul-general for Japan, Mr. Klobukowski, briefly set forth the same views.

The fact can not be denied, and the cause may be easily traced. Silver has retained its full value in the countries having a silver standard, while gold has risen, because it alone preserves the privilege of free coinage, and thus becomes the sole money of international exchange, while silver becomes a simple commodity. Thus all articles of commerce valued in gold have necessarily fallen, since with the same amount in gold one may now purchase twice the quantity of goods.

I bring this observation to the attention of the Chamber; it contains, one may say, the germ of the monetary question. I will not dwell upon this question to-day, and you will readily divine my reason—it would carry me too far. The opportunity will doubtless present itself for me some day to break a lance with the monometallists.

I am, however, ready to concede to them all that they may ask as to the advantages of gold. I willingly acknowledge that it is sound money par excellence, the best, the most convenient medium of exchange; that it is greatly to be desired that there had never been any other money in the world, and that it is the money of the future.

But the monometallists, unfortunately, can not wipe out the fact that there are 900,000,000 human beings who know only silver, use only silver, trade only with silver, and do not want gold.

Facing these 900,000,000 human beings who know nothing but silver, there are, I acknowledge, 400,000,000 gold monometallists. It is true that these 400,000,000 belong to the richest and most powerful nations, which are the creditors of the whole world. But those nations would be unwise if, intoxicated by their present power, they should despise their opponents, for these opponents—the silver countries—are young and vigorous. Their labor is cheap, and they only wait for the hand of the engineer and the eye of the overseer. Nay, they already have them.

If we but add to these advantages those offered by the silver standard, which allows of their selling their products in our markets at a low rate and acts as a protective barrier at home, favoring the development of their industries, we must not be surprised to see some day the balance turn in their favor, to the great detriment of the nations now so proud of their gold standard.

We are, unfortunately, powerless to decide this question single-handed; it is a problem of international importance. No government can solve it according to its own views; it can only urge the solution which it deems preferable.

On this point I think we have done our duty, for I am not accustomed when in power to abandon the convictions which I have always upheld. This year we were offered the opportunity of joining the United States in a diplomatic effort to induce a neighboring country to assist in measures looking to a reestablishment of a fixed relation between silver and gold, and we made the experiment. We did not demand the free coinage of silver, which does not seem to be indispensable; we but asked for a concert of measures calculated to establish this fixed relation, and to terminate the monetary anarchy which now reigns in the world, and which convulses international trade.

I do not hesitate to say that we failed. I do not, however, regret the step; it was a wise one, and its results will show hereafter. For I am convinced that the day will come when the force of circumstances will compel the nations of Europe to face the problem and solve it. I hope that until that day dawns humanity will not suffer from the vacillations which continually postpone the decision of so important a question. [Great applause.]

Mr. STEWART obtained the floor.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. STEWART. I wish to make some remarks about the resolution.

Mr. ALLEN. Very well; I do not want to postpone the Senator's remarks.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, at the time the monetary commission was provided for by law I expressed the opinion that it would necessarily be a failure—that no arrangement could possibly be made. I also expressed the opinion that it was much better for the United States to act independently; that foreign complications with regard to our domestic affairs were objectionable, if not dangerous. I am happy to say that the success of the commission in securing the cooperation of France has surpassed my hopes. I state what I believe to be the concurrence of opinion—it certainly is among all with whom I have conversed—that the commission discharged their duties faithfully and with as much success as could have been anticipated.

I did not believe that England would ever consent to any arrangement in favor of the free coinage of silver, and I am still of that opinion. She is going on making proselytes for gold wherever she can. While these negotiations were pending she secured the placing of Japan upon a gold basis. Japan has adopted the gold standard, according to reports from all sources, through the instigation of England. Of course this has destroyed Japan. She is now bankrupt. She was in a thriving condition, and emerged, as it were, from a state of semibarbarism to become a shining mark in the Orient, and was about to assume the position of one of the first-class powers.

A year ago last spring, in her official reports, she attributed her marvelous success in every direction—in manufactures, in agriculture, in commerce—to cheap silver and the difference of exchange. It was stated in that report that she had been a child compared with Europe and America as to manufactures, but she was a giant compared with other countries. With her advantage of cheap silver, she was able to achieve great triumphs, and was marching forward in prosperity. Within six months from that time, through some occult influence, she adopted the gold standard, and her revenues fell off, according to the reports in the newspapers, $25,000,000. Now she is in the market to borrow 45,000,000 yen. This shows the effect the adoption of the gold standard has had upon her. Japan is bankrupt from this hour. Before this occurred she was quite arrogant and disposed to take a stand in opposition to us. There is no talk about that any more. She is a nation of the past; she will lapse into her condition of the past very rapidly.

England remains unfriendly to bimetallism, as I supposed she would. England, however, was laboring under special stress of circumstances during the past year, when our delegation and the French delegation appeared there. Her revenues from India were interrupted not only by famine, but by the difference of exchange that was compelling the Indian people to borrow money to carry on their government; and it looked as if England would be compelled to do something. The rumor came that the officers of the Bank of England proposed to keep one-fifth of their reserve in silver. Amid all this good news, which held out as much hope as could be expected from England, when the negotiations were pending, and before they were decided, the action of the Administration on this side of the Atlantic was certainly very discouraging to our commission.

The Secretary of the Treasury, the Comptroller of the Currency, and the Director of the Mint, from the hour the commission left the wharf at New York, proclaimed that they were for the single gold standard and for perpetuating it against all odds. Just at the critical time when this matter was under consideration and before Great Britain had given her answer the President of the United States interfered in the matter and sent to Congress, on the 24th of July last, a message recommending the appointment of a commission to revise the monetary laws of the country. In that message he recommends and comments on the proceedings of a conference, or convention, which was held in Indianapolis last January.

When we examine the proceedings of that convention, we find that they recommended a perpetual gold standard, and all they proposed was legislation to carry that recommendation into effect. To accomplish that the Indianapolis gold convention, or whatever it may be called, said it was necessary to have a commission, and they appointed a committee to wait on Congress and the President of the United States to secure the appointment of a commission to carry into effect their recommendation for the perpetuation of the gold standard. The other House passed a bill for that purpose. The President recommended the two Houses to pass a bill allowing him to appoint a commission to carry out the plan of that Indianapolis convention, which is a perpetuation of the gold standard. This conference, in case they could not succeed in getting Congress and the President to act and to appoint a commission, appointed a commission of their own, with ex-Senator Edmunds at its head, and they are fulminating a plan to perpetuate the gold standard. They are about through with their labors, and the Indianapolis conference is summoned to appear again in a few days.

We have here now, sitting in this city, the National Board of Trade, representing all the banks and perhaps some other interests. Yesterday they decided most positively that the single gold standard should be perpetuated. The Secretary of the Treasury has gone on with his recommendations for the gold standard. He has submitted his plans, and every plan, every suggestion, which comes from him, is to perpetuate the gold standard in this country.

How could it be possible that our commission could be successful abroad when high officers of the Treasury Department, with the sanction of the President of the United States, were advocating the perpetuation of the gold standard as against bimetallism in any form?

More than all that, a large portion of the gold press attacked our commission to Europe before it started, and continued to do so and ridicule its project to attempt to induce Europe to adopt bimetallism when, as they claimed, this country was in favor of the perpetual gold standard. If the Administration is in favor of anything, if there is anything in its policy that is now demonstrated beyond controversy or peradventure, it is that the Administration is committed to the perpetuation of the gold standard.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly the Senator does not wish to do any injustice to any individual or any body of men.

Mr. STEWART. Not at all.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Secretary of the Treasury has not said that anywhere; the President has not said that anywhere. The Senator is arguing upon a basis of fact which does not appear. I have the message of the President of the United States to which the Senator has alluded, calling attention to the monetary commission, and he commends the report to the consideration of Congress; but nowhere has Secretary Gage or the President said that the Administration was in favor of the gold standard. The acts of the Administration are all in the other direction and in favor of bimetallism.

Mr. STEWART. I beg the Senator's pardon. The message was sent in at the suggestion of the Indianapolis conference, and the President commends to the consideration of Congress the Indianapolis plan, and the Indianapolis plan was the single gold standard per se. There is nothing else in it, and the only thing that is left to be done is to retire the greenbacks. Mr. Gage has time and time again in his plan suggested the retirement not only of the greenbacks, but of the Sherman notes and of the silver certificates. He wants them all to be put in a redemption division and only paid out for gold. He wants to put them in a mass and get rid of them, and the only thing they are discussing is how they can make the transition and get rid of all Government issues.

If Mr. Gage has argued in favor of anything, he has argued in favor of that ad nauseam; if the Board of Trade here argues in favor of anything, it stands for the gold standard per se; and if the Indianapolis convention means anything, and if language means anything, that is the foundation of their whole scheme, and the only thing left for Congress to do is to get rid of all Government issues and return to gold, as argued by the entire Administration forces. Why is it necessary for them to say we are for the gold standard when they say we are going to get rid of all Government issues and have nothing in circulation but gold and have everything redeemable in gold?

It has been suggested in this plan that we retire the greenbacks; that all greenbacks when paid in shall be only paid out again for gold. The President suggests in his message that that shall be done when the revenue shall be equal to the expenditures. Then he says the greenbacks should be impounded and only paid out for gold. What is that but the gold standard? That is the only fair construction to be placed upon his language. Of course he did not elaborate the idea as fully as his Secretary of the Treasury, but he did not repudiate what the Secretary of the Treasury said, and if they are not advocates of the retirement of all Government issues except gold, then they advocate turning the whole thing over to the banks; and if the whole fraternity are not advocating that, then the English language is a lie, for they all say that.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator from Nevada permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. I did not understand distinctly the request of the Senator from Colorado. It occurs to me that we ought to know what he desires before we proceed, and if the resolution goes on the Calendar, where it will go in a few minutes——

Mr. STEWART. I am speaking generally. In a few minutes I will be through. I understand the request is to have the resolution go over until some time in January, which is very proper.

Mr. ALLEN. What does the Senator say to having a distinct statement from the Senator from Colorado as to his wishes before we proceed further with the debate?

Mr. STEWART. I understand what I have stated to be his wish.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not know that the Senator from Colorado made any distinct suggestion.

Mr. STEWART. He made a suggestion of that kind.

Mr. WOLCOTT. My embarrassment in the matter arises from the fact that I do not think I have any right here, speaking as a Senator, not speaking officially, to make a request that the resolution shall go over. I can only leave it to the good judgment of the Senator from Nebraska. All I can say I hope to be able to state soon after the recess, and I think it is very possible the Senator may then desire to modify or change or perhaps enlarge the resolution.

Mr. ALLEN. Does the Senator from Colorado believe the commission will be able to report or to make some definite statement by the 15th of January?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I do not think the commission intend to make any report at this time, so far as I know, but of course such a report would not be made here in the Senate.

Mr. ALLEN. I understand; but will it be made to the President of the United States, so that we can obtain it from him?

Mr. WOLCOTT. That I am not in a position to say at this time.

Mr. ALLEN. Then the request of the Senator from Colorado is very indefinite. I am inclined, so far as I am concerned, to let the resolution pass over to a fixed date next month, if there is any hope or expectation that a report will be made to the President and that we will be able to obtain the report.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that I know nothing which would indicate that such a report will be made by the middle of next month.

Mr. ALLEN. Then I think we ought to press the resolution.

Mr. STEWART. If there is any doubt about the position of the Administration, of Mr. Gage, of the Director of the Mint, of the Comptroller of the Currency, and of their assistants and of the representatives of the banks, or of the Edmunds commission on this question, that their ultimate object is to retire all Government issues and turn the whole business over to the banks and adhere to the gold standard, I am prepared to argue it with the documents. If anybody questions it, I should like to proceed this afternoon or some time to argue it with the documents, because I propose to prove by documentary evidence every step taken in this matter.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Nevada does not point at last to anything that Secretary Gage says or the President says which justifies him in saying they are for the gold standard when they profess to be in favor of international bimetallism.

Mr. STEWART. I deny that.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator goes on and argues from certain acts and facts that that is the real intention.

Mr. STEWART. I deny——

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator will let me go on for a moment. The Senator goes on to argue from certain acts and certain facts that that is the real feeling and view of the Secretary of the Treasury and the President, and he argues that the effect of these various recommendations as to the currency and as to greenbacks is in the direction of acquiescing in the gold standard.

What I desire to guard against is the inference that these conclusions of the Senator from Nevada are the expressions of Secretary Gage or of the President, because they are not, and the Senator himself will so admit.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. Gage has never uttered a word publicly that has been printed in favor of international bimetallism, and I think it can be easily proven, if it comes to the test, that he is decidedly opposed to it. I have been so told by numbers of men who have talked with him. He is opposed to it, and his whole scheme shows that he is. The scheme he laid before the Cabinet is as inconsistent with international bimetallism as is night with day; and the idea that he can not be opposed to it because he is advocating another policy is untenable. A man advocates protection. You say he does not say he is opposed to free trade; but if he is advocating protection you would not think he is a very good free trader. So it is in this case. Mr. Gage advocates the single gold standard for this country, the retirement of all Government issues, and the turning over of the whole matter of money to the banks. If that is not equivalent to a declaration against international bimetallism, then I do not understand the English language; and the President in alluding kindly in his message to the Indianapolis conference, with his approval, is doing something entirely inconsistent with international bimetallism.

We would have had a test whether international bimetallism were possible if the Administration had stood by the commission. I do not believe we would have accomplished it then. We might have accomplished it. We certainly can not accomplish it, there is no use talking of it, so long as the Administration takes a position diametrically opposed to international bimetallism. So long as it is in favor of perpetuating the gold standard here, it is opposed to bimetallism in any form.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator bear in mind that the utterance which binds the President of the United States is the utterance of his message? The Senator knows what is in the message of the President of the United States. Will he allow me to have read a part of the utterance of the President?

Mr. STEWART. Yes, sir; I will allow it to be read. I know what it is. He expresses in that message kindly feelings and gratification at the action of France, but he does not express disapprobation of the hostile action of his own Administration. He does not regret that he could not have the cooperation of his own Cabinet. That is what I complain of in the message.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is all inference. The Senator infers that Secretary Gage is against the policy and plan of the President. Where the President stands appears from the statement in his message, which the Senator from Nevada has kindly agreed to allow to be read.

Mr. STEWART. Let it be read, and I will comment on it. It is right in the line of my thought.

The Secretary read as follows:

[From the message of December 6, 1897.]

Under the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1897, for the promotion of an international agreement respecting bimetallism, I appointed on the 14th day of April, 1897, Hon. EDWARD O. WOLCOTT, of Colorado, Hon. Adlai E. Stevenson, of Illinois, and Hon. Charles J. Paine, of Massachusetts, as special envoys to represent the United States. They have been diligent in their efforts to secure the concurrence and cooperation of European countries in the international settlement of the question, but up to this time have not been able to secure an agreement contemplated by their mission.

The gratifying action of our great sister Republic of France in joining this country in an attempt to bring about an agreement among the principal commercial nations of Europe whereby a fixed and relative value between gold and silver shall be secured furnishes assurance that we are not alone among the larger nations of the world in realizing the international character of the problem and in the desire of reaching some wise and practical solution of it. The British Government has published a résumé of the steps taken jointly by the French ambassador in London and the special envoys of the United States, with whom our ambassador at London actively cooperated in the presentation of this subject to Her Majesty's Government. This will be laid before Congress.

Our special envoys have not made their final report, as further negotiations between the representatives of this Government and the Governments of other countries are pending and in contemplation. They believe that doubts which have been raised in certain quarters respecting the position of maintaining the stability of the parity between the metals and kindred questions may yet be solved by further negotiations.

Meanwhile it gives me satisfaction to state that the special envoys have already demonstrated their ability and fitness to deal with the subject, and it is to be earnestly hoped that their labors may result in an international agreement which will bring about recognition of both gold and silver as money upon such terms and with such safeguards as will secure the use of both metals upon a basis which shall work no injustice to any class of our citizens.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, that portion of the message just read has two eyes, one looking toward Wall and Lombard streets and the other looking toward the betrayed people of the United States. The hypocrisy of declaring his gratification at the action of France favoring bimetallism while he tolerated the action of Gage, Eckels, Preston, and other Treasury officials opposing international bimetallism or bimetallism in any form, is humiliating to American manhood. Why should the President speak kindly of the commission which he betrayed when he commended the single gold standard plan of the Indianapolis conference to Congress, at the critical point when a favorabe answer was anticipated from Great Britain?

What we object to on the part of the Administration is its persistent double dealing in giving the international bimetallists honeyed words, while the whole power of his Administration and all the aiders and abettors of the gold standard are deliberately engaged in promoting legislation to perpetuate the single gold standard in this country and to make international bimetallism impossible. If the Administration would boldly proclaim that the pretense in the St. Louis platform in favor of international bimetallism was a fraud to deceive the American people and place the Republican party in power, to perpetuate the gold standard in this country, the President would be liberated from the necessity of living a transparent subterfuge.

Mr. ALLEN. If I can have the attention of the Senator from Colorado, I will state that I am not disposed to press the resolution at this time if the Senator is prepared to say that by or shortly after the 15th of next month a fuller statement will be made by him, or by some person representing the commission, as to the progress made looking toward international bimetallism, and I should like to have that report or statement indicate to the Senate and to the country whether, within a reasonable time, if the negotiations are not successful, they will cease and we will have a final report of the mission.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I wish to say to the Senator from Nebraska that there is not any desire on anybody's part to prolong negotiations a single day beyond the period when there is still great hope remaining that something may be accomplished.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I think there is no one member of the mission who would be willing that for an hour the matter should be left pending if a final conclusion either one way or the other had been reached or could be announced.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I think this matter ought not to be left in the air, and that there ought to be a reasonable time fixed when some fuller and more complete statement will be made as to the work of the commission. I trust that a report will be made, and I hope it will be made in accordance with the act creating the commission, and that we will be able to get that report from the President of the United States in time to enable us to formulate and pass appropriate legislation.

It is not necessary for me to say here, as I have repeatedly said, that I regard international bimetallism as a dream, a mere ideality; that it is an impossibility; but if the commissioners can bring it about, I am perfectly willing they should.

Now, in deference to the wishes of the Senator from Colorado, I am willing that the resolution shall pass over until the morning hour of the 15th day of next month or the next legislative day thereafter. I am willing that it shall be passed over with that understanding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, that will be the order.

TWELFTH AND SUBSEQUENT CENSUSES.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to ask consent at this time to make a brief statement touching upon certain questions which were discussed yesterday by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and, if necessary, I will ask that the bill which was then under consideration may be laid before the Senate for that purpose. I propose to occupy a very few moments of time, but I desire to put in the RECORD a matter which I think is of importance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the bill indicated, which will be read by title.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 94) to provide for the Twelfth and subsequent censuses.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, it was my purpose yesterday, when the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] concluded his speech on the much-mooted question of civil-service reform, to make reply to it, but the hour was so late that I abandoned that purpose. At a later day, when the matter is before the Senate, either on an appropriation bill or upon the bill which has just been laid before this body, I will take occasion to express my views on the subject.

I rise this morning, Mr. President, merely for the purpose of calling attention to the statement of Hon. Carroll D. Wright, Commissioner of Labor, in reference to the last census. I have in my hand a letter identical with the one which the Senator from Massachusetts used yesterday, written to me in reply to a note addressed to Mr. Wright several weeks ago, asking him upon what information he based his statement that if the last census had been taken under the rules of the Civil Service Commission $2,000,000 would have been saved to the country. Mr. Wright, under date of December 11, very elaborately answers my question, and apparently is of opinion that the statement he made was a very modest one, and that even a much larger sum than $2,000,000 would have been saved had the census been taken under civil-service rules.

Mr. Wright bases his calculation largely and almost exclusively upon the difference in the cost of matter per page as between the reports of the Census and the Labor Bureau. I have some little knowledge of printing, and I confess astonishment that an officer of the Government should undertake to make a mathematical calculation upon the relative number of nonpareil ems of matter in two separate reports. If the efficacy or value of a document is to be estimated by the length of it, it is obvious to every intelligent mind that the man who can write the fastest or talk the fastest will have a very great advantage in the contest.

I take it that the reports of the Bureau of Labor are somewhat different in character from the reports of the Census Bureau, and that if a careful examination is had it will be found that a calculation made upon the basis used by Mr. Wright will be a very faulty comparison, to say the least.

Mr. Wright, in his letter, goes further than the Senator from Massachusetts carried him in his contention yesterday. He goes on to show that not only might there have been a saving of $2,000,000, but that even the large amount of $6,421,245 might have been saved out of a total of $10,000,000 if the work had been carried on under the rules of the Civil Service Commission. He makes one comparison which leads him to that conclusion, and then he makes a second calculation which leads him to the conclusion that a saving of $3,372,025.21 might have been made.

Mr. President, I have the highest possible personal regard for Mr. Wright. He is a citizen of my State; he is a man who has the confidence of the country; he is a gentleman who has devoted his life to statistical matters, and I would not in a light way call into question any statement he may have made to the country or to an individual Senator; but I must here publicly express my surprise that an official so eminent in his special line of work should have, somewhat carelessly, I think, placed before the country a statement that will, I feel sure, not bear careful scrutiny and examination upon its merits.

Mr. Wright put Mr. Porter in the attitude of having wasted the public money, not because of any act of his own, but simply because he was working under a system that is vicious. Mr. Porter is known to the Senate, he is known to the country, and I never before heard it charged that his work as Superintendent of the Census was performed extravagantly. It is true that Mr. Porter has stated, in a magazine article, that in his opinion the clerks ought to have been under the civil service, and in the Philadelphia Inquirer of yesterday he repeats that statement, but it is qualified by the assertion that the clerical force should have been put under the classified service, not because efficient work could not be secured in the other way, but because there would have been less clamor in the country if it had been done.

Mr. Porter, in the Philadelphia Inquirer, calls in question the statements as to a possible saving of $2,000,000. I will read what he says on that point:

> Some very wild and ridiculous statements have been going the rounds in relation to the money which could have been saved had the Eleventh Census been placed under the civil service. The figure was started sometime ago at $2,000,000, but has gradually been growing and has blossomed out since the present discussion has come up into a cold $3,000,000.

That is less than Mr. Wright places it in either of the estimates which he has made and submitted to me in writing.

> If this keeps on, those who believe the civil service a cure for all governmental ills will soon be able to demonstrate that if the work of 1900 is only put under the direction of a scientific statistician and under the civil service it will absolutely cost nothing.

Then Mr. Porter goes on to show the different appropriations that were made by Congress, and he comes to the conclusion, which I think is not capable of being successfully refuted, that of the amounts that were appropriated there was only $3,612,667.14 left which by any possibility could have been influenced by the clerical force had it been operating under the rules of the civil service. The remainder of the appropriations was absolutely outside of the civil service, even had the work of the Eleventh Census been conducted under the direction of the three distinguished gentlemen known as Civil Service Commissioners, who seem to be running the Government to-day. Now, if that be true, and I take it Mr. Porter knows what he is talking about, it is a very remarkable circumstance that out of an appropriation of $3,612,667.14 we could have saved either $3,372,025.21 or $6,421,245, according to calculations made by Mr. Wright.

Mr. Porter says that he is perfectly willing to discuss the question on its merits, but when those who pretend to be in favor of honest and efficient government indulge in misrepresentations, such as some newspapers do which wildly demand civil service for the Census Office, it makes one lose faith in the truthfulness and honesty of these self-appointed guardians of the public service.

I think it is proper that this statement of Mr. Porter should go to the country side by side with the statement that formed the basis of the very earnest argument of the junior Senator from Massachusetts yesterday. As I said before, I will content myself to-day with this observation, and at a later date I will call attention to some other features of so-called civil-service reform that I think it may be well for us to discuss during the present session of Congress.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to print a portion of the communication, signed by Mr. Porter, in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire, that the article referred to be printed in the RECORD? The Chair hears none.

The article referred to is as follows:

ROBERT P. PORTER'S NEW YORK LETTER—WILL CIVIL SERVICE OBTAIN IN THE SELECTION OF CENSUS CLERKS?—COST OF FORMER CENSUS—RÉSUMÉ OF WHAT THE GOVERNMENT PAID TO COUNT THE PEOPLE ON THE LAST OCCASION.

Some very wild and ridiculous statements have been going the rounds in relation to the money which could have been saved had the Eleventh Census been placed under the civil service. The figure was started sometime ago at $2,000,000, but has gradually been growing and has blossomed out since the present discussion has come up into a cold $3,000,000. If this keeps on, those who believe the civil service a cure for all governmental ills will soon be able to demonstrate that if the work of 1900 is only put under the direction of a scientific statistician and under the civil service it will absolutely cost nothing. Let us look at the facts and see how three, or even two, million dollars can be saved in taking the Twelfth Census by putting it under the civil service. When it is stated that this amount was lost or expended unnecessarily by the Eleventh Census, the inference is that it can be saved for the Twelfth Census if we only put it under the civil service. Up to October 31, 1897, the total appropriations for the expenses of the Eleventh Census were as follows:

Expenses Eleventh Census.

March 1, 1889	$1,000,000.00
June 18, 1890	3,075,000.00
August 30, 1890	1,400,000.00
March 3, 1891	1,000,000.00
March 8, 1892	200,000.00
May 13, 1892	100,000.00
July 28, 1892	560,000.00
March 3, 1893	840,000.00
December 21, 1893	350,000.00
March 2, 1895	135,000.00
February 26, 1896	15,000.00
June 8, 1896	10,162.50
Transferred from farms, homes, and mortgages, act August 23, 1894	1,950.20
Receipts under section 23, act of March 1, 1889	1,629.14
Total	8,683,741.84
Disbursements to October 31, 1897	8,688,636.88
Balance on hand	104.96

There is every penny appropriated by Congress for the census proper. In addition to this, Congress, in its wisdom, made the following appropriation for a special investigation into the individual mortgage indebtedness of the people of the United States. The Superintendent of the Eleventh Census opposed this inquiry, because of its probable cost, and because such inquisitorial inquiries make the Census Office unpopular. He was, however, overruled, and Congress made the following appropriations for this specific purpose:

Appropriations, "Farms, homes, and mortgages."

Act February 22, 1890		$1,000,000.00
Act March 8, 1892		50,000.00
Act July 28, 1892		100,000.00
Act March 3, 1893		180,000.00
		1,330,000.00
Disbursements	$1,328,040.80
Transferred to expenses Eleventh Census	1,950.20
		1,330,000.00

The printing, engraving, and binding of the Census Office is another matter hardly under control of the Superintendent of the Census, because Congress decides how many volumes of each report shall be published, and the Government Printing Office decides what shall be paid for the same, and the appropriations are made direct to the order of the Public Printer.

The question of civil service does not, so far as the Superintendent of Census can control it, enter into the following appropriations for printing, engraving, and binding:

Appropriations, "Printing, engraving, and binding."

Act December 19, 1889	$250,000.00
Act August 30, 1890	350,000.00
Act December 21, 1893	6,500.00
Total	606,500.00
Disbursements	604,036.29
Balance	2,463.71

Here, then, we have the actual appropriations for the Eleventh Census, made by Congress, under all these heads, and the actual cost of each branch, which, after allowing for the cash on hand October 31, 1897, was as follows:

Amounts disbursed to October 31, 1897.

Expenses Eleventh Census	$8,688,636.88
Farms, homes, and mortgages	1,328,040.80
Printing, engraving, and binding	604,036.29
Total	10,620,713.97

There were other inquiries of a special nature included by Congress in the census of 1890 that will not be called for in 1900, and others that can be abolished altogether, so at least $2,000,000 may be really saved in this way. How $2,000,000 can be saved or could have been saved by the Civil Service Board examining the clerks, instead of a competent census board examining them, I am at a loss to understand.

Of the total amount of $10,620,713.97 expended for the census proper, $1,599,452.36 was paid out to special agents; the supervisors received $260,553.10; the enumerators, $2,485,825.07; miscellaneous, $1,097,410.75; furniture and fittings, $56,805.55; leaving the total amount paid out for salaries $5,120,667.14. Clearly this is the only item that could have been influenced by civil-service examinations. Of this amount the nonskilled labor received $508,000. By that I mean persons engaged in handling the blanks and schedules, which number into the hundreds of millions, the shipping department, card stamping and numbering, and as laborers and messengers about the several buildings.

Deducting this from the total amount paid in salaries would leave $4,612,667.14. Under the law employes of the Tenth Census who had good records were exempt from examination, as they should be, and those who had passed the clerkship examination of the Civil Service Commission were also exempted by the Secretary of the Interior. At one period of the office 25 per cent of the clerks came under this class, though when the temporary appointments were made the percentage was perhaps less. At least $1,000,000 of the $4,612,667.14 was paid to this class of employees. We have, therefore, $3,612,667.14 left, and of this it is claimed in some quarters $3,000,000, and in others $2,000,000, could have been saved had the force been examined by the Civil Service Board instead of by the efficient gentlemen appointed by the Secretary of the Interior to perform this function.

Toward the latter days of the work, when reenforcements for three months, and even sixty days, were wanted, persons called "skilled laborers," at a salary of $50 per month, were put on and engaged in all sorts of work that required quick hands and good eyesight—punching cards, working machines, addressing envelopes, etc. The total sum paid to this class of employees was $850,000, which really represents the aggregate amount paid to persons who were not employees of the Tenth Census, with good records, who had not passed the civil-service examination, or who had not been thoroughly and fairly examined by a board consisting of men of the highest character, two of whom are now occupying honorable positions in the Government service, and all three of whom are thorough believers in the merit system.

I am perfectly willing to discuss the question on its merits, but must confess, when those who pretend to be in favor of honest government and efficient government indulge in such paragraphs as the following, which I find in a newspaper, wildly demanding civil service for the Census Office, it makes one lose faith in the truthfulness and honesty of these self-appointed guardians of the public service:

"The public knows something of the faults of the Eleventh Census. It knows that an immense amount of money was wasted; that $12,000,000 was expended when $3,000,000 would have sufficed; that the Census Bureau was made a partisan Republican body, filled with narrow partisans, and largely with political bums and hangers-on who wanted work."

To begin with, I have shown that the Eleventh Census proper (that is, excluding printing, engraving, and binding, and farms, homes, and mortgages) cost only $8,685,636.88 up to the 31st of last October.

That of this, $260,553.10 was paid to supervisors, and to enumerators $2,485,825.07. The cost of this work alone for the Twelfth Census will probably exceed $3,000,000. If the inquiries of the Eleventh Census are not required by Congress, two millions can be saved in this way, and the cost of the Twelfth Census brought down to from $9,000,000 to $10,000,000. The man who undertakes to do the work for less than this figure will fail. A saving can also be effected by giving plenty of time to preliminary work, and this Congress seems inclined to do.

Mr. PRITCHARD. Mr. President, I desire to submit a few remarks in this connection with respect to the modification of the civil service. There has been a great deal of talk in regard to the declaration contained in the Republican platform with respect to the law. There is nothing to be found in the Republican platform which in the least interferes with the honest enforcement of the merit system. The declaration in question reads as follows:

The civil-service law was placed on the statute book by the Republican party, which has always sustained it, and we renew our repeated declaration that it shall be thoroughly and honestly enforced and extended wherever practicable.

This declaration indicates by implication that the law had not been honestly enforced by the Democratic party during the late Administration, and is a pledge that, in so far as the Republican party is concerned, we are to have an honest enforcement of the civil-service law and that it is to be extended wherever practicable.

The first inquiry, then, is: Has there been an honest enforcement of the civil-service law? In response to this inquiry I am prepared to show that there has not been an honest enforcement of the law. And in making this statement I do not wish to be understood as imputing corrupt motives to those who have administered the civil-service law, but I do assert they have permitted their partisan zeal to induce them to place a construction on the civil-service law in many instances that is at variance with the spirit as well as the plain letter of the law.

There can be no such thing as an honest enforcement of the law if we are to permit the classification as made by Mr. Cleveland to remain in force, and it is the imperative duty of the Republican party, in pursuance of the declaration I have just quoted, to modify the law so as to give expression to the honest intentions of the framers of the statute. It is as much our duty to see to it that the abuses growing out of the improper interpretation of the law are corrected as it is to secure the honest enforcement of the law in any other respect. Some would have us believe that those who favor a modification of the law are thereby placing themselves in opposition to the principles of Republicanism. But such is not the case. We are simply endeavoring to secure that which we are entitled to according to all the rules of fairness and justice, to wit, a fair and impartial administration of the law.

The opposition to this law, which is now so manifest in every State of the Union, is due to the insatiable greed for office which characterized those who were charged with the management of our public affairs during the last Administration. So long as the civil-service law was held to apply to the postal service and other clerical positions in the Departments only, there was no discontent, and, as a general rule, such enforcement of the law was acquiesced in by the majority of our people.

It is a singular coincidence that it never occurred to Mr. Cleveland to make such sweeping extensions of the civil-service law until he reached that point when it was obvious to him that his party was to be repudiated by the American people at the next general election, nor until nearly all Republicans had been removed from office and their places filled with simon-pure Democrats. The present hostility to the merit system is the legitimate result of such unwise manipulation of the law. Such construction of the law has given the structure dimensions entirely out of proportion to its original foundation. In order that we may have a proper conception as to the extent of the various orders promulgated by Mr. Cleveland, in which I claim that he acted without authority of law, I call the attention of the Senate to the following facts in relation thereto:

First. Deputy collectors of internal revenue and customs were placed in the classified service.

Second. The Government Printing Office was included in the classified service.

Third. Laborers, messengers, and watchmen were included in the service.

I now propose to consider these classifications in their order, and give you the reasons why I think their classification is not warranted by the civil-service law. The Civil Service Commission has no jurisdiction over deputy collectors in that they are not officers of the Government in the sense contemplated by the civil-service act.

Deputy collectors are appointed by the collector to act as his agents and in his stead in certain instances. They execute to the collector an official bond, conditioned for the performance of their duties, but, while this is true, if a deputy collector, while in the discharge of his duties, commits a tort, or if he at any time embezzles Government funds, he is not held directly responsible to the Government for his misconduct, but the collector at once becomes responsible to the Government and to the public for the official misconduct of his deputy. These officers are appointed in accordance with section 3148 of the Revised Statutes, which reads as follows:

Each collector shall be authorized to appoint, by an instrument in writing under his hand, as many deputies as he may think proper, to be by him compensated for their services; to revoke any such appointment, giving such notice thereof as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may prescribe, and to require and accept bonds or other securities from such deputies. Each such deputy shall have the like authority, in every respect, to collect the taxes levied or assessed within the portion of the district assigned to him which is by law vested in the collector himself; but each collector shall, in every respect, be responsible both to the United States and to individuals, as the case may be, for all moneys collected and for every act done or neglected to be done by any of his deputies while acting as such.

It is perfectly clear to my mind that this section means nothing more nor less than that these deputies are simply agents of the collector, and that, so far as responsibility in accounting to the Government is concerned, the collector alone is considered. It is insisted that the law presupposes that officials who are placed in the classified service shall continue in office during good behavior or so long as they faithfully perform their duties. I do not concur in this opinion; but suppose that the contention is correct; then it is impossible to make this guaranty as respects deputy collectors, because their tenure is uncertain and depends solely upon the duration in office of their superior—the collector—from whom they receive their authority to perform the duties assigned them.

The moment the collector retires from office the official lives of his deputies cease to exist. They are simply agents of their principal, and their principal being no longer in existence, their agency terminates by simple operation of law. But suppose, for argument's sake, that by some mysterious power unknown to man and unauthorized by statute these officials continue to have official existence, I take it that no one will seriously insist that the collector should be deprived of the authority to name his subordinates, when it is admitted that among other things they are charged with the collection of taxes for which the collector is responsible to the Government on his official bond.

The classification of the Government Printing Office is, in my judgment, without warrant of law. In the first place, to adopt the language of the Public Printer, the Government Printing Office "is simply a great manufacturing plant, involving varied branches of skilled labor of high grade. The civil-service rules are, in my judgment, an obstruction rather than an aid to efficiency and economy. In my opinion the civil-service rules as promulgated for enforcement here should be modified radically, suspended, or repealed."

This is the statement of the Public Printer, Mr. Palmer, who is a practical printer and who has heretofore served the Government acceptably in the same capacity in which he now acts. He is a gentleman of high character, and if we are to give credence to his statement the interests of the Government can best be subserved by excluding the Government Printing Office from the classified service. So far I have assumed for argument's sake that the civil-service law authorized the classification of the Government Printing Office, but as a matter of fact I think I am prepared to show that Mr. Cleveland's action in promulgating rules for the Government Printing Office was unauthorized by law. The civil-service law was enacted on the 16th day of January, 1883, and on the 12th day of January, 1895, sections 44, 45, 48, and 49 of chapter 23 of the Supplement of the Revised Statutes of the United States, volume 2, were enacted, which provide as follows:

SEC. 44. There shall be appointed by the Public Printer a chief clerk, who shall be a practical printer, and versed in the art of bookbinding, whose salary shall be $2,400 per annum; and a foreman of printing, and a foreman of binding, who must be practically and thoroughly acquainted with their respective trades who shall each receive a salary of $2,100 per annum.

SEC. 45. It shall be the duty of the Public Printer to employ workmen who are thoroughly skilled in their respective branches of industry, as shown by trial of their skill under his direction.

SEC. 48. The Public Printer may employ two clerks of class 4, at an annual salary of $1,800 each; two clerks of class 3, at $1,600 each per annum; one clerk of class 2, at $1,400 per annum.

SEC. 49. The Public Printer may employ, at such rates of wages as he may deem for the interest of the Government and just to the persons employed, such proof readers, laborers, and other hands as may be necessary for the execution of the orders for public printing and binding authorized by law; but he shall not, at any time, employ in the office more hands than the absolute necessities of the public work may require.

This law expressly confers upon the Public Printer the authority to prescribe such rules as he may deem necessary for the proper selection of the employees in the Government Printing Office. Here is a law enacted subsequent to the enactment of the civil-service law that brings this question within the rule of construction of statutory law which provides that the latest expression of legislative will is the law unless the same is amended or repealed. Therefore, if we are governed by this rule, and I must say that I consider it our imperative duty to adopt the rule, inasmuch as it has the sanction of the highest judicial tribunals in the land—such being the case, what is the duty of the Republican party in the premises? It is clearly our duty to secure such modification of the law, by legislation or otherwise, as will insure a correct interpretation of the statutes as well as an honest enforcement of the same.

I am prepared to show by the express wording of the civil-service act that the classification of laborers or workmen is not only unwarranted, but in violation of the act itself.

Among other things section 7 provides:

* * * But nothing herein contained shall be construed to take from those honorably discharged from the military or naval service any preference conferred by the seventeen hundred and fifty-fourth section of the Revised Statutes, nor to take from the President any authority not inconsistent with this act conferred by the seventeen hundred and fifty-third section of said statutes.

Nor shall any officer not in the executive branch of the Government, or any person merely employed as a laborer or workman, be required to be classified hereunder.

Nor, unless by direction of the Senate, shall any person who has been nominated for confirmation by the Senate be required to be classified or to pass an examination.

Here is a plain and simple declaration which declares that no laborer or workman shall be required to be classified under the civil-service act. It is true that the word "merely" is used in this connection, but I deny that it is used for the purpose of drawing a distinction between laborers and workmen. It was used, in my judgment, for the purpose of drawing a line of demarcation between those who occupied clerical positions, such as clerkships in the Departments, and those who held the positions of messengers, watchmen, and other places that can be classified under no other head than that of laborers or workmen.

We can appreciate why it was that the framers of the act sought to make a clear distinction between those holding clerkships and similar positions in Departments and those employed as laborers and workmen. In the absence of the qualifying word "merely" it might with plausibility be contended that all parties in the Departments whose duties were of such a character as to involve the performance of physical labor are excluded under this proviso, and under such a construction it could be shown that clerks were in a certain sense laborers.

In order to extend the civil-service law to limits beyond its legitimate scope the Civil Service Commission has undertaken to draw a distinction between laborers—classifying one grade as skilled laborers and the other as mere laborers, and in the Government Printing Office an entirely new device has been adopted by which those who in other Departments are designated as mere laborers are divided into classes, and one class is designated as "helpers," when in truth and in fact they are performing similar duties to those who are designated as mere laborers. Under the civil-service rules as promulgated November 2, 1896, and January 15, 1897, for observance in the Government Printing Office the following classes of employees are classed as skilled laborers:

Assistant doorkeepers, boxers, captains of watch, charge of charwomen, charge of countingroom, charge of delivery room, charge of glue room, charge of gold sweepings, charge of helpers, charge of numbering, charge of piece sewers, charge of sewing machines, charge of stitching, charge of warehouse, counters, directresses, doorkeepers, examiners, feeders, firemen, floor hands (not mechanics), folders, gold workers, helpers, hoisters, hydraulic pressmen, knife grinders, leather cutters, perforaters, sawyers, stablemen, telephone operator, wagon master, wagon messengers, watchmen, yard master.

Here we have an illustration of the methods adopted by the last Administration in order to keep Democrats in office. We are gravely informed that "stablemen" and "knife grinders" are skilled laborers. Does anyone contend that this is not an unwarranted usurpation of power and one that is in direct conflict with the provisions of the civil-service law, which provides that no laborer or workman shall be classified? It is such high-handed methods that have caused opposition to the merit system.

It is clearly a misnomer to say that a stableman is a skilled laborer, and no one knew it better than Mr. Benedict when he made this classification. It is the duty of the Republican party to correct this abuse at once, because if we do not there can be no such thing as an honest enforcement of the law. The ugliest feature connected with the classification of the Government Printing Office is the fact that numbers of unskilled laborers working inside of the Government Printing Office are denominated as "helpers" in order to evade the plain letter of the law. The Public Printer, in his letter addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, among other things, says:

The only persons here who are not by these rules included in the classified service are charwomen and laborers employed in working outside of the Government Printing Office proper. Unskilled laborers employed inside of the office are denominated as "helpers," and are included in the classified list.

It is not contended by Mr. Palmer that parties employed as "helpers" are skilled laborers, but on the other hand he plainly says that they are not skilled laborers. However, in order to thwart the will of the framers of the statute, these men are called "helpers."

While I do not wish to use harsh terms in discussing this matter, at the same time I must insist that such practice in ordinary human affairs would be denominated a fraud. I have endeavored to show that in three notable instances there has been an utter disregard of the provisions of the civil-service act by Mr. Cleveland during his Administration. If such abuses are not corrected it will result in the absolute repeal of the merit system.

Before I conclude, there is another view of this question that I desire to call to the attention of the Senate. The civil-service law, within certain prescribed limits, vests the Chief Executive with discretionary power as to its application. It is, then, purely a question as to what extent we are to go in applying the civil-service rules as respects the Executive Departments in order to secure the best results in the way of efficient service. I have given this subject much thought and I am convinced that all positions in the service wherein the appointee is required to possess executive ability should be excluded from the classified service.

It seems to me that those who favor the merit system should agree to the proposition that you can test the clerical ability of an individual, in a measure, by a written examination, but that you can not test the executive ability of an individual by such examination. For instance, you can not decide by a written examination as to whether or not the individual is a smooth-tempered or well-balanced man. You can not decide as to whether or not he has enough common sense to direct the affairs to him intrusted. In other words, to test the executive ability of an individual it is necessary that you should see him face to face and satisfy yourself by a personal investigation as to his qualifications and as to his past life—as to whether or not in the past he has demonstrated the fact that he does possess executive ability. Such being the case, it is highly essential that special agents, as well as chiefs of divisions, should be excluded and their selection left entirely with the heads of Departments.

I call attention to the following extracts from letters written from the heads of different Departments. Secretary Wilson, of the Department of Agriculture, among other things, says:

The experience I have had since I have taken charge of the Department leads me to conclude that it is difficult to get heads of divisions with sufficient practical experience through civil-service examinations. We want men in my Department who not only have a good foundation education, but also a good deal of practical knowledge of the world; and we are quite likely to get bright schoolboys. They answer civil-service questions better than men who have been away from school and college some years, and yet, while they are able to do that, they lack the practical experience which is absolutely necessary in the heads of some of my divisions.

As to field agents, I will state that it is necessary, in carrying out the laws of Congress, to send confidential agents to find out things. I can illustrate: The Agricultural appropriation bill just passed requires me to send a man to Alaska to ascertain whether, if an experimental station were established there, it would be beneficial to the people of that Territory. I understand I have power to appoint a man for only ninety days. So in that case I will ask leave of the Civil-Service Commission to send a man, and it will agree that I can send one for ninety days. Then at the end of that ninety days of course his work will not have been completed, and I must ask leave to extend the time, etc.

It seems to me that these special agents should not be under the civil-service rules. Peculiar qualifications are necessary there which will not be brought out by a civil-service examination, and the employment is for only a little while.

Secretary Bliss, of the Interior Department, among other things, says:

The chief clerk of this Department and the chiefs of divisions should, in my opinion, be exempt from the classified service. These officers occupy confidential relations to the Secretary, and on their briefs or recommendations he is dependent, to a large extent, for the proper conduct of his office.

I am of opinion, also, that the special agents, such as land and timber inspectors, mineral-land commissioners, and particularly the special Indian agents, or the appointment of such, should be more directly under control of the Secretary, who is responsible for their actions and who must depend upon them very largely for his knowledge of affairs in distant regions.

The grave responsibility resting upon the Secretary of the Interior for actions taken upon the recommendation of such officers makes it necessary, in my opinion, that he should have a controlling voice in their appointment. It might be practicable to form an examining board within the Department, consisting, say, of the Secretary or Acting Secretary and the four Commissioners, who should make such special examination of applicants for these offices as may be judicious.

Commissioner Hermann, of the Land Office, among other things, says:

In my opinion, deputy collectors of internal revenue and deputy United States marshals should not be included in the classified service.

The existing rules of the civil service should be modified, so far as the bureaus of all the Departments are concerned, in respect to their application to chief clerks, chiefs of divisions, receiving clerks, and confidential clerks, the inspectors, and also as to all special agents of the Departments, including mineral-land commissioners in Montana and Idaho, mine inspectors, and principal examiners of land claims and contests.

These officers sustain close confidential relations to the heads of the Departments and the bureaus, the special agents being required to have the qualifications of detectives, which qualifications can only be tested by experience and observation and by reputation, and not by any civil-service examination.

The chiefs of division should be especially exempt from the classified service, because their relations are not only confidential to the bureau head, but they constitute the last line of demarcation between the political relations of the Administration and the justly clerical or civil-service divisions of the Departments. The chief of a division is its presiding officer, and should possess the qualities essential to a presiding officer, and his general deportment should be such as to command the respect and add to the discipline of the corps. He should be selected especially as to his general fitness as such chief.

If it is assumed that the dominant party shall shape the legislation in the country in consonance with the policies which it sustains, it has a right to know that the chiefs of divisions, who first shape recommendations as they are called for through the various divisions, are in perfect sympathy with the party policies. The most important legislation in Congress emanates from the divisions in the form of reports on measures pending in Congress, and which are usually first submitted to the heads of the Departments, and by them to the heads of bureaus, who in turn submit it to the chiefs of divisions.

The chief clerks are confidential advisers of the heads of bureaus and Departments and are the custodians of important secrets which involve the public interests, while at the same time they should be in the highest sense acceptable and personally agreeable to the one who must repose confidence in them.

The heads of Departments and bureaus can well be trusted to select only such persons for the particular places named as shall have all the necessary qualifications and fitness therefor.

Mr. Evans, Commissioner of Pensions, says:

I have the honor to request that the following positions be exempted from the classified service, viz: The chief clerk, the appointment clerk, the private secretary, the chiefs of division, the special examiners, the physicians composing the medical examining boards.

These positions should be under the control of the Commissioner in order to insure harmonious and effective organization.

I have in my possession numerous statements from others connected with the public service that are in accord with these letters, and they should have great weight with the Republican party in dealing with this question.

These men are gentlemen of integrity and their Republicanism has never been questioned. They are not only men who stand high in the councils of the Republican party, but they are men of affairs—successful business men. They have demonstrated to the world that they possess executive ability in a high degree, and it does seem to me that those of us who are not only in favor of perpetuating the merit system, but the Republican party as well, should adopt the suggestions of these men who are daily required to deal with the question under consideration in a practical way.

We may have ever so many theories in regard to this matter, but after all it is our duty as representatives of the people to be guided by those who have had practical experience in such matters. While I am opposed to this law as now administered, at the same time I propose to confine my opposition to it inside of Republican lines, feeling confident as I do that the Republican party will settle this question as it always has settled public questions, to wit, in such a manner as to secure faithful and efficient public service and at the same time not infringe upon the rights of the American people.

During the delivery of Mr. PRITCHARD'S speech,

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WHITE in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it becomes the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 112) to amend the immigration laws of the United States.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be the order, if there be no objection.

After the conclusion of Mr. PRITCHARD'S speech,

Mr. QUAY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 2 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, December 17, 1897, at 12 o'clock meridian.

RETURN OF BILL TO THE SENATE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following request from the Senate, which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate bill (S. 2365) "to amend the Indian appropriation act of June 17, 1897, and for other purposes."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom the bill was referred, will be discharged from its further consideration, and the same will be returned to the Senate.

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. 1610. An act directing the Secretary of the Navy to consider and report on the subject of a statue of the late Admiral David D. Porter.

S. 2612. An act prohibiting the killing of fur seals in the waters of the North Pacific Ocean.

S. 2508. An act granting the right to the Omaha Northern Railway Company to construct a railway across, and establish stations on, the Omaha and Winnebago reservations, in the State of Nebraska, and for other purposes.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 1610. An act directing the Secretary of the Navy to consider and report on the subject of a statue of the late Admiral David D. Porter—to the Committee on the Library.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the bill (S. 251) for the relief of Henry Wolfe, of Shelbina, Shelby County, Mo., will be referred, from the Committee on Claims, to the Committee on War Claims.

There was no objection.

DESTITUTE CITIZENS IN THE YUKON VALLEY.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask if there be objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5173) authorizing the Secretary of War, in his discretion, to purchase subsistence stores, supplies, and materials for the relief of people who are in the Yukon River country, to provide means for their transportation and distribution, and making an appropriation therefor.

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $175,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended, in the discretion and under the direction of the Secretary of War, for the purchase of subsistence stores, supplies, and materials for the relief of people who are in the Yukon River country or other mining regions of Alaska, and to purchase transportation and provide means for the distribution of such stores and supplies.

That the said subsistence stores, supplies, and materials may be sold in said country, at such prices as shall be fixed by the Secretary of War, or donated where he finds people in need and unable to pay for them.

That the Secretary of War may, in his discretion, purchase and import reindeer and employ and bring into the country reindeer drivers or herders not citizens of the United States, or provide any other means of transportation as in his judgment he may deem practicable. The said reindeer or other outfit may be sold and disposed of by the Secretary of War when he shall have no further use for them under the provisions of this act, or he may turn over the same or any part thereof to the Department of the Interior, and the proceeds arising from all sales herein authorized shall be covered into the Treasury.

The Secretary of War shall make report, in detail, to Congress, at the beginning of its next regular session, as to all purchases, employments, sales and donations, or transfers made under the provisions of this act.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which has been read.

Mr. BAILEY. Reserving the right to object, I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois if the matter has been considered by the Appropriations Committee?

Mr. CANNON. I will say to the gentleman from Texas, practically, yes; technically, no.

I will say to the gentleman that for some little time past various members of the committee have had their attention directed to the matter, but in the last few days the members of the subcommittee considering the deficiency bill in part have been quite busy with that subject. As we are so near the adjournment for the holiday recess, it was not practicable to call a full meeting of the committee, and it is evident that if this appropriation is made at all it should be made at once. After consultation with the gentleman's colleague [Mr. SAYERS], who is also a member of the subcommittee on deficiencies, I present this bill and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration. If the gentleman desires, I will make my statement now, but it seems to me it would be better to get the unanimous consent, and then I will proceed to make the statement.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, if my colleague, Governor SAYERS, has investigated the matter, and if he thinks it is proper, I shall not object at least.

Mr. SAYERS. I do not think there can be any question as to the propriety of the passage of the bill.

Mr. BAILEY. Of course we might disagree as to that, but I certainly am willing to allow it to be considered.

Mr. SAYERS. There is no doubt but that there is an absolute necessity for the relief of the miners in the Yukon Valley.

Mr. BAILEY. I would ask my colleague if that necessity for relief is due to the poverty of those people there? We have heard marvelous stories about the richness of the mineral deposit. Is it due to their poverty, or is it due to the difficulty of egress and ingress?

Mr. SAYERS. It is due to the impossibility of private parties getting provisions to those people who are in the Yukon Valley, from 700 to 1,000 miles distant from the two bases of supplies. The object of this bill, as I understand it, is for the Government to transport and sell the provisions to such as are able to pay for them, and, of course, to give them to those who are not able to pay. Unless this bill shall pass before the holidays, then it will be impossible to give them the relief which they ought to have.

Mr. BAILEY. I am not of the opinion that the Government ought to become a storehouse keeper to sell provisions.

Mr. SAYERS. I think not, either, as a rule.

Mr. BAILEY. But at any rate, Mr. Speaker, I am sure there is merit enough in the proposition so that I shall not object to its consideration, though I think I shall not be able to vote for it.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, there is no objection, I believe.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I would reserve the point of order while we hear the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CANNON. Very well, Mr. Speaker. Some time last winter, when legislation was pending concerning Alaska and the valley of the Yukon, I took occasion to say that from the present temper in the country, which led great flocks of people, some provident and many improvident, to go to the valley of the Yukon, that I very greatly feared before the close of the present winter Congress would be called upon to send relief to a part, if not all, of them. People were warned in the newspapers, and all that kind of thing; but, nevertheless, many thousands of people went to the valley of the Yukon, some prepared, most of them probably unprepared. For some days we have been gathering all the information in our power. I have had full conferences with the War Department, and especially with Dr. Sheldon Jackson, who, so far as I know, has perhaps more practical knowledge touching the valley of the Yukon than anybody to whom we have had access. He was there as late, I believe, as September 15. I asked him to make a written abstract of what he has said to me and to members of my committee touching the situation there, and I will ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
BUREAU OF EDUCATION, ALASKA DIVISION,
Washington, D. C., December 15, 1897.

SIR: In compliance with your request, I respectfully submit the following memoranda:

In accordance with the instructions of the United States Commissioner of Education I spent three months during the past summer in the Yukon River Valley, reaching Dawson (Klondike) July 23. On the night of the 26th the steamer started upon its return trip down the river, reaching Forty Mile Creek village and Fort Cudahy the same night. The next evening we were at Circle City, and shortly after leaving that village our steamer went hard aground on a sand bar, where I remained until August 15, when I was taken off with the other passengers by the arrival of another steamer. That evening we reached and visited Fort Yukon.

On the 17th we visited Rampart City (Munook Creek), which is the rising mining town of central Alaska, reaching St. Michael August 24. On this trip up and down the Yukon River, 1,700 miles each way, I saw every store and trading post on the river, and at that time there were no large stores of provisions for the winter. The trip made by myself was on one of the first steamers that went up the river in the summer, and the miners were depending upon each of the steamers plying on the river making three round trips during the season. Owing to the unusual low stage of water this expectation was not fulfilled. A few of the steamers made two round trips and others only one, the result being that when navigation closed in September there was no large supply of provisions anywhere along the Upper Yukon Valley. There is an abundant supply stored in the warehouses at St. Michael, on Bering Sea, unloaded at that place from the ocean steamers. The failure of the river steamers to get up the river prevented the distribution of those supplies where needed. To remedy this, the Secretary of War telegraphed myself last September to turn over all the reindeer trained to harness under my control, as Government agent, to Lieutenant-Colonel Randall, U. S. A., who, with a detachment of troops, was en route to St. Michael.

Colonel Randall is under instructions to take the food stored at St. Michael, organize reindeer freight transportation, and distribute it in the mining towns along the Yukon River. Rampart City, by the way of the mouth of the river, is 1,075 miles from St. Michael. With the reindeer crossing the country the distance will be about 600 miles. I have turned over to Colonel Randall about 200 trained deer, and it is probable that he will be able to supply all the miners from the mouth of the river as far as Rampart City, and possibly may be able to extend the trip up to Fort Yukon, which is 1,553 miles from St. Michael by the way of the river, or 878 miles from St. Michael across the country as the deer will travel. I think there need be no apprehension with regard to special suffering by the miners as far up the river as Rampart City. The special destitution is between Fort Yukon and Dawson City, a distance of about 300 miles. Within this district, I should judge, there is a population of about 5,000 people, distributed as follows:

Circle City	1,000
Fort Cudahy and Forty Mile Creek village	700
Dawson	3,000

It is next to impossible to take the provisions that long distance, from St. Michael to Dawson, with the few trained reindeer that are at the disposal of Colonel Randall. Relief for these 5,000 people must be taken in from Dyea, on the Pacific coast, in southeast Alaska. The distance from Dyea to Dawson is 578 miles; to Fort Cudahy, 628 miles; to Circle City, 798 miles, and to Fort Yukon, 840 miles. There are probably 500 miners in the Upper Yukon district that have laid in provisions for twelve months and have an abundant supply for themselves. In former years those that were thus situated have divided with those that were less fortunate. That will probably be done this season.

It is possible that there is sufficient food that can be obtained in that manner to last the population until the 1st of March, but no additional food supply can reach that region before June. Consequently it becomes necessary to furnish supplies for the months of March, April, May, and possibly June. During these months it will be impossible to take provisions from the coast at Dyea into the Yukon Valley either by horses or dogs. A very limited supply could be packed by men on their backs, but not a sufficient quantity to meet the exigencies of the case. The only possible method of taking the food into the country in quantities at that season of the year will be by reindeer trains, and therefore I heartily approve of the request and recommendation of the Secretary of War that 500 reindeer, at least, shall be purchased in Lapland, taken across the continent to Dyea, and used for transporting food.

I inclose tables of distances, both by southeast Alaska and also by the mouth of the river.

Very respectfully, yours,

SHELDON JACKSON,
General Agent of Education in Alaska.

Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON,
Chairman of Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, gentlemen know who Dr. Sheldon Jackson is. This proposition received the approval also of the War Department. Gentlemen will understand that on the shore of the Bering Sea, at St. Michael, there are plenty of provisions, which were taken up there during the past season, but owing to the lowness of water and the large immigration, the accustomed number of trips could not be made up the Yukon River to Circle City and to Dawson. Now, there are 200 Government reindeer at St. Michael, broken to harness, and those 200 Government reindeer are sufficient to transport supplies as far as Rampart City, or Munook Creek, which is the principal mining camp in that part of Alaska. There need be no apprehension but what they will have enough to eat.

It is barely possible that Yukon, 225 miles farther on, may be relieved from St. Michael, but that is hardly probable. Now, when you get many hundred miles beyond that—to Circle City and to Dawson and the various mining camps—it is not possible that they should be relieved from St. Michael, because there is no possibility of transportation that would carry the supplies. Then the only way they can be relieved is from Dyea, in the opposite direction. Now, there are plenty of provisions at Dyea, but no transportation and no possibility of transportation in any considerable supply, possibly, except by reindeer. Now, the Government——

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman state to the House the distance from the latter place to the mining camps?

Mr. CANNON. From Dyea?

Mr. SAYERS. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Well, it is stated here. Fort Yukon is 1,353 miles from St. Michael by way of the river, or 878 miles by reindeer route. Now, from Dyea, on the Pacific coast in southeast Alaska, to Dawson is 558 miles; to Fort Cudahy, 628; to Circle City, 798, and to Fort Yukon, 840 miles. Now, Dr. Jackson says there are 5,000 people in this district, practically, that can not be reached from St. Michael, and that their food will be exhausted by the 1st day of March. That leaves them, then, three months without food and without the possibility of private enterprise taking it to them. Possibly, he says, there would be no starvation there, because while there are many poor people there, there are many people there who have plenty of gold wherewith to purchase, but there is no food to be purchased; and in the absence of a possibility of getting food there without the intervention of the Government we make this recommendation.

Now, how is it to be done? I hold in my hand a statement which shows that 600 reindeer can be bought in Lapland and put at Dyea by the 1st of March, after making a full allowance for contingencies, of death of reindeer, for $60,000. Sixty Lapp drivers will cost $30,000. That is a liberal estimate and will cover it. These reindeer can make two trips from Dyea to this mining district in three months—possibly three, if there is a necessity for them to make a trip so as to reach that part of the country in June. But it is safe to count on two trips. Now, they can take army rations, which cost 18 cents apiece, and which in full army rations would cost $16.20 to the inhabitant, but they can not take this amount. They can take enough rations if the inhabitants were put on a little over quarter rations, which, according to my information, is sufficient to preserve the people from starvation, and thus relieve the whole 5,000 by putting them upon quarter rations.

We therefore recommend the $60,000 for the reindeer, the $30,000 for the drivers, the $24,300 for the purchase of the rations; and then, to give leeway to the Secretary of War, we give $50,000 to cover miscellaneous expenses and all contingencies; which might bring more reindeer, which might purchase more provisions and a different order of provisions, and which might, in the judgment of your committee, care liberally for this service as far as it is practicable to care for them. In this bill we give the Secretary of War full discretion to buy these reindeer, buy these provisions, transport them, and sell them to people who are able to buy. Our information is that substantially the Government will be reimbursed for this expenditure, because there is a great number of people there who are not paupers, but who are not able to exchange their gold for something to eat. All such can reimburse the Government. We give him discretion, if there be people who are not able to purchase, that he can relieve them without price.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. I understand you to say that it would be the 1st day of March before they could start from Dyea?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; before they could leave Dyea.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. Have you any information that the miners have provisions to last them until that time?

Mr. CANNON. Dr. Jackson says that by a division of the food of those people who are supplied in full for the year round they could exist until the 1st of March; but there is no way to get anything to them before that time; so that they must starve, if they are in a starvation condition, until we can get provisions to them.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. One further question—I am asking for information. While these reindeer, of course, in Lapland exist on the moss of that country, is it not a fact that the country over which they will have to travel is a boggy country, which at that time will be covered 10 feet in snow and ice, or is there plenty provision for them?

Mr. CANNON. Dr. Jackson and everybody who knows anything about the matter seem to agree that for a short distance out of Dyea the reindeer will have to be subsisted, but that after you get from that place a short distance there is no difficulty in obtaining moss.

Mr. LOW. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. LOW. Why is it that the miners there are without food?

Mr. CANNON. Some of them went up there, perhaps, without being duly advised. No doubt many of them went recklessly, and they are there now without food, first, because the low stage of water in the Yukon River cut off one run of boats up that river, and second, because, as I have said, many of them went there improvidently. I am not here to offer any defense of their imprudence, but that does not affect the merits of this proposition.

Mr. LOW. Will the gentleman permit me to make a short statement?

Mr. CANNON. I would rather the gentleman would ask me a question, if he desires, and let me get unanimous consent for the consideration of this bill.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Is it not a fact that the great majority of these miners whom you propose to relieve are located on British territory?

Mr. CANNON. I understand that many of them who are American citizens are located on British territory at Dawson, but I also know that they are American citizens, and if they are there starving, whether they are British or whether they are American, in the presence of starving and suffering humanity we can not fail to act in this matter. [Applause.]

Mr. LOW. Now may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. LOW. Is it not a fact that the transportation companies which took the miners up there absolutely refused to permit them to carry their food along?

Mr. CANNON. I will say to my friend that I do not know. I have seen that stated, but, from some information which has come to me, I am inclined to think that, like many other reports, that one does not contain a great deal of truth. However, whether the fact is so or not, it makes no difference so far as this bill is concerned.

Mr. LOW. Certainly not. I am not opposed to the recommendation of the committee.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Is it not a fact that 80 per cent of the inhabitants of Dawson City and of the Klondike region generally are American citizens, and that nearly all the mining claims are owned by citizens of the United States?

Mr. CANNON. My information is that a majority of the people at Dawson are American citizens.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Is it not also a fact that a majority of those who went up last year by the Yukon and through the White and Chilkoot passes took with them sufficient provisions, and that the suffering which now exists is owing to the fact that the transportation companies have been unable to bring up the anticipated supply?

Mr. CANNON. I have already said that Dr. Jackson explains that, owing to the low stage of water in the river, the usual transportation up the Yukon failed.

Mr. LACEY. Suppose these reindeer were shipped from Lapland, what route would they take and what would be their condition on their arrival? After making that journey nearly round the world and being landed at Juneau, would they be in condition, after so hard and long a journey, to carry provisions to the suffering miners? Dr. Jackson has had some experience in testing the condition of reindeer after taking journeys, and I should like to know what he says about that.

Mr. CANNON. I do not know. He says that it is entirely practicable to bring these reindeer from Lapland and have them ready to start by the 1st of March. We did not cross-examine him upon that question. Perhaps we might have done so if it had been possible to get reindeer from any other place. But it will be observed that the whole matter is left in the discretion of the War Department. The Secretary of War is to look over the whole ground and act according to his best judgment in the presence of existing conditions.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There was no objection.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I would like to hear the bill read again.

The bill was again read.

Mr. CANNON. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY].

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I simply desire to say that I have never found myself willing to be charitable out of the public money, and, therefore, I have never been able to vote for the many resolutions which have passed this body since I have been a member of it to provide for the relief of people who were distressed and suffering by flood, famine, and other calamities. I believe that charity ought to be voluntary. I believe it is a noble trait for men to put their hands into their own pockets and freely give to relieve the distresses of their fellow-men, but I do not believe that we have a right to put our hands into the public Treasury and to take the earnings of men who are poorer than many of those whom we seek to relieve, and give that money to people who are better able to give than those are from whom they take. But, Mr. Speaker, I realize that this is one of those peculiar cases which appeal so strongly to the humanity of members that they are not willing to listen to an argument while their fellow-countrymen are suffering.

I am not going, therefore, to protest specially against the sending of relief. Perhaps that has been done so often it is no longer an open question. But I do protest against what seems to me to be a new departure, in this, that the Government establishes storehouses and becomes a vender of provisions. If these people are suffering, and if this is a proper case for relief, then relieve them; but I am not willing, and I think I never shall be willing, to see this Government become a mere trader in the markets of the world, buying provisions and selling them to even a suffering people.

The sum involved is not very great at most, and I would infinitely rather see it given, without the hope or expectation of a dollar of it being returned, than to see the United States engage in a mercantile venture. It seems to me that, if we ought to send this relief at all, we ought to send it without even the desire to have the bread we cast upon the waters returned to us after many days. If we are going to be charitable, let us be fully charitable; let us eschew the question of profit and loss and deal with this occasion as we have dealt with other occasions of this kind.

It is not a gratifying spectacle to see the Government of the United States go into the open markets to buy provisions and sell them; no more will it be a gratifying spectacle to see the United States Government become a vender of reindeers after they have relieved the suffering of the people in Alaska. If the suggestion could possibly commend itself to the judgment of the gentleman from Illinois and his colleagues on the committee, I should be very much more content to see this measure passed over my protest without that provision than to see it passed with that provision.

Mr. KNOX. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BAILEY. I had taken my seat, but I will reply to any question.

Mr. KNOX. Would the gentleman think it proper or just for the legislature of Texas to relieve a similar case of distress in the State of Texas?

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman, I presume, has in his mind a resolution which passed this House recently giving relief to certain people of Texas. I wish to say that if I had been here on that occasion I would have voted against giving a dollar in the way of such relief.

Mr. KNOX. That is not the question. Does the gentleman believe it would be right for the legislature of his State to relieve the sufferings of its own people—such suffering as is sought to be provided for here? That is the question.

Mr. BAILEY. If I believed that, I would not go into the barter and exchange business. I would give the suffering people provisions without any charge against them.

Mr. KNOX. I simply wished the gentleman to answer whether he would believe it proper and right for the legislature of his State to take such action with reference to citizens of that State.

Mr. BAILEY. There might be a case of such extreme hardship that I would think such relief proper. We have poorhouses in every county in Texas. I am glad to say that we do not have them very full, but we make such provisions for the unfortunate as I presume every State in the Union does. There might possibly be a great and sudden calamity, a Providential affliction, as it were, which would appeal strongly to the legislature of Texas—so strongly that if I were a member of that body I might be willing to vote an appropriation for relief. While I say there might be such a case, none such has ever arisen in my legislative experience.

Mr. KNOX. Then in the case of these people who have no State government, who have substantially no other government than that of Congress, is it not proper for us to relieve such distress as is presented here?

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman from Massachusetts did not listen to me intently, otherwise he would have perceived that I agree that this is possibly a closed question, and I rose mainly to protest against seeing the Government become a merchant on this occasion.

Mr. CANNON. Now a word in conclusion, and I will ask a vote. It is not necessary for me to criticise former appropriations to relieve suffering within our borders. If precedents were necessary, they are numerous, and in cases, too, where there was not one tithe of the excuse or justification for them that there is in this case. In the case of floods on the Ohio River, and on the Mississippi River, and on the Alabama River, and in Texas we have time and again made these appropriations.

Mr. SAYERS. And on the Missouri River.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; and on the Missouri. For Oklahoma we have time and again granted relief of this kind, in a land which, if you will allow me to say it, "flows with milk and honey." In these cases relief has been given. Now, what is this case?

The gentleman says he apprehends this bill will pass; that he is not seriously opposing it, but criticising it. Why criticising it? He says that the Government in this case turns itself into a merchant to buy and sell reindeer, to buy and sell provisions. Now, sir, principles were made for men, not men for principles; and while the gentleman from Texas is right on the general principle that this Government of ours should not go into the commission business, yet, after all, I never would sacrifice humanity by blind adherence to a principle, nor would I tax the people in a case of this kind unless there is a necessity for doing so in order to avoid the sacrifice of humanity.

Now, what is the condition here? How plain a story shall demolish the objections of our honorable friend from Texas. There are 5,000 people on the upper Yukon, most of them with gold—more gold than we have, more gold than the average citizen has—gold, gold, gold! But people can not eat gold. Those people would undoubtedly pay $100 a barrel for flour; perhaps twice that much. But if they were willing to pay $10,000 a barrel for flour, there is not a barrel there for them to buy. They would pay a dollar a pound for meat—yes, $2 a pound—but there is no meat there to be bought. Nor can any meat or flour be put there by private enterprise.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the gentleman from Illinois permit me to suggest that we do in this case as we have done in other cases, notably in the early case of Ireland, and on other occasions—simply supply the means of transportation and allow these supplies to be forwarded and disposed of by other agencies than the Government?

Mr. CANNON. Ah, if you supply the means of transportation to the private owner of provisions, then the private owner of provisions absolutely says to these people who are in want, "Give all you have or all you ever expect to have in order to be relieved from the dangers of starvation."

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman of course does not understand me to suggest that we supply the merchants who intend to sell on speculation the means of transportation, but to furnish transportation to people who intend to carry their own provisions into that region.

Mr. CANNON. But, Mr. Speaker, there are people who can not avail themselves of such means at this time. There are people in that region now who must have immediate relief. Let us be practical in business matters.

Another thing: Most of these people who stand in need of relief have gold sufficient to pay twentyfold, aye, fiftyfold, the price of provisions delivered at Dyea. But there are between 700 and 800 miles of icy travel between the base of supplies and the point where the supplies are required. The only way to overcome this obstacle is for us to authorize now, as this bill provides, the use of reindeer to cover the intervening space by the 1st of March, and even then, with the utmost diligence and expedition, they would be only able to take up probably a fourth of the rations necessary for the people who are in want there, and that is just the amount of food that will stand between them and starvation.

Now, with the gold in their possession, there are lots of these people who would not take these provisions from the Government as a gift, but they would say, "Take my gold in return," and those who have the wherewith to pay ought to pay for the relief. Those who have not the wherewith ought to receive assistance without payment, and therefore we give to the Secretary of War the humane discretion, broadly, to give where he finds the necessity existing; and that is the whole situation and that is all there is of it.

But there is not a poor man in my country, no matter what his poverty, but would say, "Send provisions there, as there is no other way, and let the Government be reimbursed from those who are able to reimburse it." That is practical legislation, and I will not sacrifice practical legislation to mere theory.

I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] such time as he desires.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I will say to my colleague [Mr. BAILEY] that the clause in the bill which provides for the sale of the reindeer is a clause which follows the policy of the Government that has been enforced since, I suppose, its first existence.

Upon our statute books will be found authority given to the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and to other officials to dispose of the property of the United States, provided it shall have been condemned as unfit for use.

An examination of the bill will show that these reindeer are to be used by the Secretary of War for the purpose of transportation. When the provisions shall have been transported to the camps on the Yukon River, and if it shall appear to the Secretary of War that there is no further use for the reindeer, then it will be in his discretion either to turn them over to the Department of the Interior or to sell them.

Mr. BAILEY. But, if my friend will permit me to suggest it, the immemorial policy of the Government to permit the sale of the property to which he refers proceeds upon the theory that that property is required for the purpose of executing governmental functions.

Mr. SAYERS. That is so, of course.

Mr. BAILEY (continuing). And surely my colleague will not insist that it is a governmental function, under Democratic theories of government, to carry provisions over the country and sell them to the people of the United States?

Mr. SAYERS. I will not engage with my friend in a discussion as to what may be the Democratic theory of government with reference to the pending proposition.

The conditions are these: Alaska is a Territory of the United States. The people there have no State organization. They have not even county organizations; in fact, they have no organization whatever recognized by the Government except such as they have improvised for themselves.

There are from 600 to 1,000 miles between the two bases of supplies. The owners of these supplies—private citizens, private corporations—would gladly carry them to the camps if they had the means of transportation. But they have not and can not get the means.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman from Texas allow me an interruption just there?

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. BLAND. I want to submit a case that might be analogous in one sense to the pending proposition. Suppose the people of this country in that Territory were threatened not only by starvation, but were in the midst of hostilities with Indians or other people by which they might be massacred, or in a position where any other calamity might befall them. Could it possibly be claimed that Congress—the representatives of the Government of the United States—had no power to intervene and protect them from destruction?

And when they are threatened by the calamity of starvation, more terrible than a hostile foe, how can it be said that it is not Democratic or constitutional to protect American citizens in this condition and in a Territory subject to our jurisdiction, not within a State, but within its own police jurisdiction?

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, the best authority upon the condition of Alaska and of the people of Alaska with whom I am acquainted is Dr. Sheldon Jackson, who was before a portion of our committee, and it was upon his testimony, supplemented by information that we obtained from the War Department, that this bill was drawn and has been presented to the House for its consideration.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SAYERS. Yes.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. You propose by this bill to establish Government warehouses?

Mr. SAYERS. No; nothing of the kind.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Well, just a moment. You propose to establish storehouses.

Mr. SAYERS. Not at all.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. You are going to transport provisions and sell them. I do not suppose you will sell them on the highway. You are going to stop somewhere and sell them, and have this Government, in its sovereign capacity, locate trading posts along the river, anywhere from 800——

Mr. SAYERS. But there are no provisions in those trading posts.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. There are gold camps located along the Yukon River anywhere from 800 to 1,200 miles in British territory.

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Now, by what right of law does this Government propose to go into a country that is patrolled and policed by Great Britain, over which she is now exercising sovereignty, to establish trading posts for the purpose of dispensing provisions to citizens of this country?

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, in the first place this bill does not contemplate the establishment of trading posts. In the second place it is sufficient to know——

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Are you not bound to establish some place in which to sell the provisions?

Mr. SAYERS. In the second place it is sufficient to know that there are there American citizens in a starving condition, and whether it be on Canadian territory or the territory of any other government, we have the right to send supplies to them. [Applause.] The gentleman will remember that when the proposition was to send supplies to the naturalized citizens residing in Cuba, that measure passed almost without a dissenting voice.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I realize that the patriotic sentiment expressed by the gentleman is quite natural, and it justly elicits applause; but why is it that the American citizens who have been confined in Cuba for months do not excite the patriotic ire of some of these gentlemen?

Mr. SAYERS. Well, that has nothing to do with this. One thing at a time. I yield back my time to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to have a vote upon this bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CANNON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CONTINGENT FUND OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. ODELL. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. ODELL] presents a privileged report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred sundry resolutions, beg leave to report as follows:

The resolution, No. 57, directing the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay out of the contingent fund of the House to Amelia A. Giddings, widow of Edwin Giddings, late conductor of elevator in the House of Representatives, a sum equal to his salary for six months and $150 for funeral expenses, is approved.

The resolution, No. 65, directing the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay out of the contingent fund of the House to Marcella Lannan, widow of William Lannan, late chief engineer of the House of Representatives, a sum equal to six months of his salary and $150 for funeral expenses, is approved.

The resolution, No. 97, appointing George Jennison, of New York, as a special messenger to serve in and about the House under the direction of the Doorkeeper, at a salary of $1,200 per annum, to be paid out of the contingent fund until otherwise provided for, is approved.

The resolution, No. 28, providing that William Richardson be paid the difference between his salary as folder at $840 per annum and $1,200 per annum for acting as assistant foreman of the folding room, from March 15, 1897, is hereby reported adversely.

Your committee, therefore, beg leave to report and recommend the adoption of the following, to wit:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, to Amelia A. Giddings, widow of Edwin Giddings, deceased, late conductor of elevator in the House of Representatives, a sum equal to his salary for six months, and that he be further directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, the expenses of the funeral of the said Edwin Giddings, said expenses not to exceed the sum of $150.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, to Marcella Lannan, widow of William Lannan, deceased, late chief engineer of the House of Representatives, a sum equal to his salary for six months, and that he be further directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, the expenses of the funeral of the said William Lannan, said expenses not to exceed the sum of $150.

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That George Jennison, of New York, be appointed as special messenger to serve in and about the House, under the direction of the Doorkeeper, at a salary of $1,200 per annum, to be paid out of the contingent fund until otherwise provided for.

Mr. ODELL. Mr. Speaker, if there is no objection, I will ask for a vote on all the resolutions.

The question was taken, and the resolutions were agreed to.

On motion of Mr. ODELL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were agreed to was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the other resolutions will lie on the table.

There was no objection.

UNEXPENDED BALANCE OF ARMY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for immediate consideration of the joint resolution I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution (H. Res. 87) authorizing transfer of $50,000 of the unexpended balance of appropriation, "Pay, etc., of the Army, 1896," to "Pay, etc., of the Army, 1897," to meet deficiencies in last-named appropriation.

Resolved, etc., That the sum of $50,000 of the unexpended balance remaining of the appropriation, "Pay, etc., of the Army, 1896," be transferred to "Pay, etc., of the Army, 1897," to meet any deficiencies which may arise in the payment of the Army under the latter appropriation.

Amend the title so as to read: "Joint resolution authorizing transfer of $85,000 of the unexpended balance of appropriation, 'Pay, etc., of the Army, 1896,' to 'Pay, etc., of the Army, 1897,' to meet deficiencies in last-named appropriation."

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman a question, if he will yield.

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. SAYERS. This is a deficiency bill, is it not?

Mr. HULL. Hardly that.

Mr. SAYERS. And a matter that ought to have gone to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that the matter did come to the Committee on Appropriations, but the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs informs me, and on inquiry I find it is so, that there is a surplus in the appropriations of the year before last, the fiscal year, of $85,000.

Mr. HULL. And $35,000 more than that.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. CANNON. More than that; and there is a deficit in the pay of the Army.

Mr. HULL. For this last fiscal year.

Mr. CANNON. For the last fiscal year. Technically speaking, it ought to be treated in the deficiency bill; but as it has been earned, and as the gentleman's committee has investigated it, and was desirous that these people should not wait longer, I told him, so far as I was concerned, I would not interpose an objection.

Mr. SAYERS. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HULL. I should like to make a statement; but all right, I will yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. SAYERS. I understand this is to meet a deficiency in a certain branch of the military service for the present fiscal year.

Mr. HULL. For the last fiscal year, ending June 30. Some of the men have not been paid under the last appropriation act.

Mr. SAYERS. I feel like objecting to the consideration and letting it go to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HULL. Before objection is made, I should like to make a short statement.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I want you to cover this point, if you please, in your statement: I should like to know if at the end of the fiscal year 1896 there was an unexpended balance, it was not covered into the Treasury by operation of law?

Mr. HULL. No; it runs three years before it is covered back. I would like to make a little statement. The Paymaster-General sent this bill here at the extraordinary session, and was very anxious to get it through at that time. It came before the Committee on Military Affairs as an unexpended balance of the appropriations. I concede the Committee on Appropriations may claim jurisdiction of the matter, and I spoke to the gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of that committee, in regard to it. The Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of War sent urgent letters to us, stating that this should be passed, if possible, before the holidays, as otherwise the men in the Army—soldiers—would not get their pay before the holidays, and would not have the money that they have earned and which has been provided for by law. They were very anxious to have it done for that reason. The unexpended balance will leave something like $35,000 after the $85,000 has been authorized to be paid; and this is simply paying what the Government owes and what the men will eventually have to be paid.

Mr. McMILLIN. I should like to ask the gentleman how the deficiency arose in the first instance?

Mr. HULL. It arose because the Army was recruited up during this time.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then there was an insufficient appropriation made?

Mr. HULL. An insufficient appropriation was made at that time, but I will say to the gentleman——

Mr. BAILEY. Does the gentleman mean to say that there has been an increase in the Army?

Mr. HULL. There has been no increase in it.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman said "recruited up."

Mr. HULL. The Army is very rarely full, and sometimes almost the entire enlisted men are enlisted. At other times, by reason of desertions and one thing and another, the number runs down.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman, then, means to say that it took more to maintain the Army in the last fiscal year than it did the preceding year?

Mr. HULL. Oh, yes; and it will cost more this year than it did last.

Mr. BAILEY. Then, Mr. Speaker, without intending to be arbitrary or discourteous, I think that that would be better taken care of in the bills as they come up; and I will object.

Mr. HULL. Then the men will have to wait for their pay.

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, they will be paid.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its secretaries, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That when the two Houses adjourn on Saturday, the 18th day of December, they stand adjourned until 12 o'clock meridian on Wednesday, January 5, 1898.

PELAGIC SEALING.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent of the House to take up a bill which has just come over from the Senate—Senate bill 2612. It is the bill which was called up a few days ago, but too late in the afternoon for consideration. It has been unanimously agreed to by one committee of the House and by the corresponding committee of the Senate, and I do not think its consideration will lead to long debate.

The bill (S. 2612) prohibiting the killing of fur seals in the waters of the North Pacific Ocean was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That no citizen of the United States, nor person owing duty of obedience to the laws or the treaties of the United States, nor any person belonging to or on board of a vessel of the United States, shall kill, capture, or hunt, at any time or in any manner whatever, any fur seal in the waters of the Pacific Ocean north of the thirty-fifth degree of north latitude and including the Bering Sea and the Sea of Okhotsk.

SEC. 2. That no citizen of the United States, nor person above described in section 1, shall equip, use, or employ, or furnish aid in equipping, using, or employing, or furnish supplies to any vessel used or employed, or to be used or employed in carrying on or taking part in said killing, capturing, or hunting of fur seals in said waters, nor shall any vessel of the United States be so used or employed.

SEC. 3. That every person guilty of a violation of the provision of this act, or of any regulations made thereunder, shall, for each offense, be fined not less than $200 or more than $2,000, or imprisoned not more than six months, or both; and every vessel, its tackle, apparel, furniture, and cargo, at any time used or employed in violation of this act, or of the regulations made thereunder, shall be forfeited to the United States.

SEC. 4. That if any vessel of the United States shall be found within the waters to which this act applies, having on board fur-seal skins or bodies of seals, or apparatus or implements suitable for killing or taking seals, it shall be presumed that such vessel was used or employed in the killing of said seals, or that said apparatus or implements were used in violation of this act until the contrary is proved to the satisfaction of the court.

SEC. 5. That any violation of this act or of the regulations thereunder may be prosecuted either in the district court of Alaska or in any district court of the United States in California, Oregon, or Washington.

SEC. 6. That this act shall not interfere with the privileges accorded to Indians dwelling on the coast of the United States under section 6 of the act of April 6, 1894, but the limitations prescribed in said act shall remain in full force.

SEC. 7. That this act shall not affect in any way the killing or taking of fur seals upon the Pribilof Islands, or the laws of the United States relating thereto.

SEC. 8. That any officer of the naval or Revenue-Cutter service of the United States, and any other officers duly designated by the President, may search any vessel of the United States in port or on the high seas suspected of having violated or of having an intention to violate the provisions of this act, and may seize such vessel and the offending officers and crew and bring them into the most accessible port of the States and Territory mentioned in section 5 of this act for trial.

SEC. 9. That the importation into the United States by any person whatsoever of fur-seal skins taken in the waters mentioned in this act, whether raw, dressed, dyed, or manufactured, is hereby prohibited, and all such articles imported after this act shall take effect shall not be permitted to be exported, but shall be seized and destroyed by the proper officers of the United States.

SEC. 10. That the President shall have power to make all necessary regulations to carry this act into effect.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have an understanding as to the time that is to be allowed for debate. Otherwise I shall have to object.

Mr. HITT. I will yield to the gentleman whatever time he desires. I do not know of any other member who wishes to discuss the bill.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, the bill before the House, and which has passed the Senate, is exactly the same as a bill which was sent to the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House by the Secretary of State, and through him by the Secretary of the Treasury, and considered there very carefully. It was unanimously approved by all the members of that committee. I may state that owing to a confusion in the indorsement of reference, the original bill which was considered in the committee, and which the committee instructed me to ask unanimous consent to take up, was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. In the record of the House proceedings a few days ago it is mentioned as reported from that committee, which is erroneous.

The reasons for this bill are stated by the Secretary of State and Secretary of the Treasury in two letters which I hold in my hand. They are as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, December 6, 1897.

SIR: By direction of the President, I desire to bring to your attention the subject of the prohibition of citizens of the United States from engaging in the killing of fur seals in the waters of the North Pacific Ocean, with a view to such action by Congress as the subject may require.

The accompanying letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, to whose Department the administration of the seal islands pertains, sets forth the reasons which from an administrative point of view call for the legislation requested. In addition to these there are strong diplomatic reasons why immediate action should be had.

For the past three years, during which representations have been made by this Department to the British Government protesting against the continuance of the indiscriminate slaughter of the seals by pelagic sealing which was resulting in the destruction of a valuable industry of the United States, the answer has been made that British subjects were not the only participants in this practice and were not solely responsible for the decrease of the herd. The Secretary of the Treasury has pointed out the effect of the award of the Paris Tribunal of Arbitration in nullifying the laws of the United States in their application to the high seas, and in making it lawful for citizens of the United States to engage in pelagic sealing.

Since the regulations of that tribunal have been in force, a comparatively small number of American vessels have engaged in killing seals at sea, but there is evidence to believe that a considerable American interest has been invested in the sealing vessels which sail from Canadian ports under the British flag. This condition of affairs has made it very embarrassing to the Government of the United States to press its demands upon Great Britain for a further restriction or the abolition of pelagic sealing.

A convention has recently been signed between the United States, Japan, and Russia providing for a joint prohibition of pelagic sealing for the coming season, on condition that Great Britain shall adhere to it.

The convention has in view the initiation of negotiations between the four powers for an agreement upon measures for the adequate protection of the seals and the restoration of the herds to their normal condition. These negotiations will be facilitated by the speedy passage of a law prohibiting American citizens from engaging in pelagic sealing. In view of these pending negotiations, and of the fact that another sealing season will begin toward the last of the present month, I urgently recommend that a bill to accomplish the purpose set forth in the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury may, if possible, be enacted into a law before the holiday recess.

Respectfully, yours,

JOHN SHERMAN.

Hon. ROBERT R. HITT,
Chairman Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., December 3, 1897.

SIR: I desire to bring to your attention the subject of the killing of fur seals as pursued by American citizens in the waters of the North Pacific Ocean and Bering Sea. The practice is, in my opinion, inconsistent with the duty which the Government of the United States has assumed respecting the fur seals resorting to the Pribilof Islands.

Soon after the acquisition of Alaska, laws were enacted making it unlawful to kill any fur seal either on the islands or in the waters of Alaska except under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and the killing of female seals was absolutely prohibited. When the privilege of taking seals on the Pribilof Islands under strict supervision was granted to the lessees for a valuable consideration, it became both the duty and the interest of the Government to afford all reasonable protection to the seal herd, not only while on the islands, but as far as possible when absent therefrom. The laws enacted for that purpose were construed to apply to all the waters of Bering Sea east of the line laid down in the treaty of cession from Russia, and for many years they afforded protection to the seals when on their migrations. When pelagic sealing began, the British Government questioned the power of the United States to enforce these laws beyond the 3-mile limit, and the Tribunal of Arbitration of Paris sustained the position of Great Britain.

That tribunal, however, recognizing the duty of the Governments concerned to protect and preserve the herd, adopted regulations respecting pelagic sealing which it thought would be adequate for the protection of the seals. Under these regulations it became lawful for American citizens and vessels to engage in pelagic sealing. The first year's experience in the application of the regulations proved that they would be entirely inadequate for the protection of the seals, but that, on the contrary, if pelagic sealing continued under them, the herd would be rapidly diminished and very soon be commercially exterminated. Each subsequent year has more fully demonstrated this conclusion. In the statement of facts recently agreed upon between the American, British, and Canadian experts it is shown that the herd has been diminished to about one-fifth of its normal condition, and that it has already become so depleted that it is neither profitable to the lessees nor the pelagic sealers.

It is humiliating to have to acknowledge that American citizens and vessels have been active participants in this ruinous and shameless slaughter. In the judgment of our experts and those most competent to devise a remedy for this state of affairs, the continued decrease of the herd can be stopped and restoration to its normal state be brought about only by the total suspension of pelagic sealing. In this opinion I fully concur, and as the first step in the direction it should be made unlawful for citizens of the United States to engage in the business. Dr. David Starr Jordan, the accomplished naturalist, who, under appointment of the President, has during the past two years visited the Pribilof Islands and made a thorough study of the condition of the seals, has recommended the abolition of pelagic sealing as the only adequate means of protecting the herd. And he adds: "It would be well for America to lead the way in stopping pelagic sealing by restraining her own citizens without waiting for the action of other nations. We can ask for protection with better grace when we have accorded unasked protection to others."

My predecessor, in recommending action by Congress, said: "I firmly believe the United States Government should prohibit pelagic sealing by its own citizens. I think it ought to go into this controversy with clean hands. It is an immoral pursuit; 75 per cent of the seals killed at sea are females; 75 per cent of the females killed are heavy with young or have pups on the islands. Their young thereupon die with them or starve on the islands. It is an inhuman butchery; and I believe it is the duty of the United States to stop it as regards at least its own citizens."

In accordance with the foregoing views, I have caused to be drafted a bill for enactment into a law by Congress, which, if it meets with your approval and does not in your opinion conflict with pending or prospective negotiations, I have to suggest may be brought to the attention of the proper committees of Congress for consideration and action. I have to add that in view of the fact that the next sealing season begins the last of December or early in January, it is of urgent importance that prompt action be taken, as otherwise American sealing vessels will have put to sea and they will participate in the further slaughter and destruction of the herd.

Respectfully, yours,

L. J. GAGE, Secretary.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

The purpose briefly is this: It is to again prohibit pelagic sealing. A law which we passed years ago prohibited the hunting of seals upon the high seas in all Alaskan waters.

By the language then used, prohibiting the catching of seals in "the territory" or "waters of Alaska," we meant the whole Bering Sea east of the one hundred and eightieth meridian. A question was raised by the British Government as to the extent of our marine jurisdiction, they contending that our Government had no authority beyond the 3-mile limit and we contending that the waters of Bering Sea east of the Russian boundary were waters of Alaska and under the authority of Congress. The question was submitted to arbitration, and in the terms of the treaty making the submission it was agreed that the decision of the tribunal should be binding upon the citizens and subjects of both parties.

The Tribunal of Arbitration decided against us—that we had no jurisdiction beyond the 3-mile limit—so that that law was annulled by the decision made under the treaty, even as applicable to citizens of the United States. I could read, if it would not take too much time, from the decision of the court in the case (United States court of appeals in the case of La Ninfa), stating this much more fully, but the result, in brief, is that we are now left without any law prohibiting persons who are subject to our laws from hunting seals on the high sea. While this is not so important practically, so far as the number of sealers from the United States is concerned, it has become quite important in the negotiations which are pending.

Mr. HOPKINS. The gentleman stated the other day that this proposed legislation could have no effect upon the Canadian and British sealers or those of any other country.

Mr. HITT. I am just coming to that.

Mr. HOPKINS. The position in this bill is unlimited as to time, and I would ask my colleague if it would not be better to have some limit fixed, so that if the negotiations which are now pending between our Government and Great Britain with reference to the prohibition of hunting seals by Canadians and other foreigners should fall through, our countrymen could have the same privileges in Bering Sea that would be enjoyed by the citizens of other countries?

Mr. HITT. I will answer that by saying that we are aiming, and the purpose of this bill is, to aid in the discouragement of pelagic sealing. But we ought first to prevent our own citizens from engaging in that kind of work before denouncing others.

There are probably not many of them who do it. It costs the Government in loss of revenue of the United States about $12.62½ whenever an American poacher kills a seal. The American poacher, we must confess, is not always under the American flag; he is often under the British flag. They had a lesson several years ago, when a British claim for damages for arrests in pelagic sealing came up, of the advantage of being under that flag, and since that time American citizens who wish to engage in seal poaching go up to Victoria and get under the British flag. This fact is referred to in Secretary Sherman's letter.

Mr. HOPKINS. But if these pending negotiations should fall through, then, there being no prohibition on the Canadians from engaging in this business, this law would absolutely prohibit American citizens from going into Bering Sea for that purpose, while leaving it entirely open for the Canadians. Would not that be the real effect of the law as it stands in this bill in case the negotiations should fail?

Mr. HITT. Yes; it would prohibit Americans from pelagic sealing, and we have not yet secured any agreement prohibiting Canadians.

The gentleman, I know, wishes to defend any practical or really profitable right that an American may have. But we do not admit that there is any moral right in anybody to carry on pelagic sealing. We claim that it is all barbarous, unneighborly, contrary to the interest of mankind. That is the position of the American Government. We also know that as a practical fact no considerable American interest or industry is touched. There is no very great industry of Americans involved in this business. There are certain facts which show that pelagic sealing itself, as it is becoming less gainful, is dying out with the diminution of the herd. It costs so much more to catch 5,000 or 10,000 seals in the open sea than it formerly did that this business is languishing. The share of Americans in the business has always been small.

It has generally been carried on under the British flag. But whether the interest is large or small, this is a very important fact in regard to the logic and honesty of our position in the negotiation. We ought to forbid our own citizens doing what we want others to forbid as barbarous. We are now pressing a negotiation to which Russia and Japan have assented, and Great Britain has also assented to some important underlying facts within the last few weeks. So it is progressing. The result of this negotiation, we hope, will be to stop pelagic sealing. Now, this is a matter of very great importance to our Treasury, to our country, and to the prosperity of our citizens, for if we can stop pelagic sealing, the herd, we trust, will again increase to such a degree as to afford an annual yield of 100,000 a year of male killable seals.

Mr. HEPBURN. Has any gentleman any data from which he can give the House information as to the value of pelagic sealing to the Canadians? What does it amount to annually to them? I have seen the statement made that the aggregate is a quarter of a million of dollars. I have also seen the amount stated as half a million.

Mr. HITT. No man can state with precision its value in dollars. The number of seals killed at sea altogether during the present year, so far as reported, was 25,079. There used to be a very great number of seals annually killed at sea—many more than at present, sometimes over 60,000. The number is steadily diminishing from year to year with the diminishing profit.

Mr. HEPBURN. Probably, then, the profit does not exceed a quarter of a million dollars.

Mr. HITT. I can not say. The profit varies with the price of the seal and the cost of hunting on the high seas, which is constantly increasing. It takes more ships and men to catch a thousand seals than formerly. There has been, in past years, much assertion about the millions of seals that could never be touched or substantially diminished in the open sea, as contended by the British; and, on the other hand, the imminent utter destruction and extinction of the herd, as contended for by the Americans. The fact, as agreed upon very recently by the delegates from Great Britain and the United States, is that—

> The diminution of the herd is yet far from a stage which involves or threatens the actual extermination of the species—

That is, the utter extinction of the last one—> so long as it is protected in its haunts on land. It is not possible during the continuance of the conservative methods at present in force upon the islands, etc.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. I ask the gentleman to read a few lines further in that agreement, showing whether the experts here in Washington last October did not decide that commercially the herd is already extinguished.

Mr. HITT. I will read to the conclusion of the paragraph:

> It is not possible during the continuance of the conservative methods at present in force upon the islands, with the further safeguard of the protected zone at sea, that any pelagic killing should accomplish this final end. There is evidence, however, that in its present condition the herd yields an inconsiderable return either to the lessees of the islands or to the owners of the pelagic fleet.

In that state of things, when the profit has been so greatly reduced in all forms of this business, we wish to restore protection—and we think we can do so, for the interest enlisted against it is not so great as formerly—we hope to restore protection to the seal upon the high seas as well as upon the islands. In order to be consistent, to be sincere and honest, the first step, when we are claiming that it is unneighborly and barbarous and inhuman to kill the mother seal and the unborn seal in this way, is to prohibit it ourselves, for as the Secretary has said in his letter we are met at each step of the negotiations with embarrassment. The question may well be asked us, If it is wrong, why do you do it, and why do you not prevent it by your own people?

Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to take up further time; but I believe my friend from North Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] desires to make some remarks.

Mr. HEPBURN. One other question before the gentleman from Illinois takes his seat. Is it not a fact that the difficulties thrown in the way of our contention during the negotiations on this subject have come from Canada rather than from Great Britain?

Mr. HITT. That is true.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DINGLEY). Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from North Dakota?

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. I desire to take the floor in my own right. I am in opposition to the bill and could not take time from the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Illinois reserve the remainder of his time?

Mr. HITT. I do.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I think we can agree with the gentleman from Illinois that this industry of pelagic sealing is insignificant, so far as the American part of it is concerned. This bill is therefore nothing more or less than an attempt to bolster up two great British industries, one located in the Bering Sea and the other located in London, both of which are ironclad monopolies.

It is true, as the experts agreed in Washington in October last, that we shall not probably extinguish the last one of the specimens of seals—the last of the race—by pelagic sealing; but it is also true, as agreed upon by the experts of both Governments, that for commercial purposes the herd is already extinct. We are called upon not to protect, therefore, an existing herd, because the herd as it now exists is not worth protecting. That is agreed upon. But we are called upon to legislate in such manner as to build up a herd.

That, Mr. Speaker, is something that has been tried in vain many times before. There have been at least thirty herds of seals discovered at various times, but none of them has ever been recuperated when it has been commercially destroyed.

On this subject, as to what has become of the other herds, I wish to read a short compilation which I made when we had this subject under consideration in the last Congress:

What has become of other herds? Captain Cook discovered seals on Desolation and South Shetland islands, nearly south from Cape Horn. They were stripped of seal life in a few years—320,000 skins being taken in 1820 and 1821.

Kerguelen Land, Southern Indian Ocean; discovered in 1772. In twenty-eight years 1,200,000 skins were taken there and the herd exterminated.

Crozett Islands, same ocean, same fate.

Mas-a-Fuera Island, in South Pacific, off coast of Chile; discovered in 1797; herd at that time estimated at 2,000,000 or 3,000,000; 3,000,000 carried to China in seven years and herd destroyed.

South Georgia, in the South Atlantic, produced over a million skins in a few years; herd extinct.

Coast of South America about Cape Horn teemed with seal life when discovered. Now only a few stragglers are found; not enough to pay to hunt.

As late as 1854 a small seal island less than a mile in diameter was discovered in the Japan Sea by Americans. A herd of 50,000 seals was exterminated in three years.

Now there are only three herds left in the world.

First. A small herd on the Lobos Islands, in the mouth of the River La Plata; capacity, 5,000 to 12,000 skins per annum; protected by Republic of Uruguay.

Second. The herd on the islands of Copper and Bering, coast of Kamchatka; capacity, 40,000 skins per annum; protected by the Russian Government.

Third. Our Alaska herd on the Pribilof Islands; estimated from 6,500,000 in 1887 down to 175,000 in 1895.

It is idle to talk about restoring a seal herd when once broken up. It has never been done. In the Southern Hemisphere there are well-authenticated cases where a depleted herd was not hunted for fifty years—left undisturbed—and yet it did not recuperate. Our Alaska seal herd is an anomaly.

So long as that herd was only exposed to slaughter for a few days in the spring, while rushing between the Aleutian Islands in passing from the North Pacific to Bering Sea, and again for a few days in the fall while passing the same points going back to the Pacific, so long as no man knew whence they came or whither they went or where they lived either in winter or in summer, they were comparatively safe. But when Pribilof discovered the islands of St. Paul and St. George, in Bering Sea, where the seals resort and stay in summer, then it became possible to exterminate the herd any summer. They would have been so exterminated in a very few years but for the protection of the Russian Government.

Being safe in summer under protecting regulations and safe in winter under their ancient shield of secrecy as to where they were in the almost boundless Pacific, it was still possible for this herd to exist for a few years. But when the British Government sent four war ships into the Pacific for the express purpose of following the herd all winter and of revealing the route to Canadian sealers—when that expedition succeeded in its plan and published its charts, then the herd was doomed.

After fifty years of rest and opportunity for recuperation these antarctic feeding grounds were visited and a few straggling animals found, but not enough to pay for hunting—to furnish a cargo for a vessel. Only two herds worth mentioning are now left, one on the Commander Islands and our own, or what is left of it, on the Pribilof Islands. A few have been preserved at the mouth of the La Plata River in Uruguay and protected by that Government, and a few have also been discovered and preserved off the Cape of Good Hope, under the protection of the Government of Cape Colony. In 1854 a herd was discovered in the Japanese Sea, but in one year after their discovery the whole herd of 50,000 were taken and destroyed.

The seal, Mr. Speaker, is a very peculiar animal, unfit for living in competition with man. In the regular order of things it should have been destroyed with the great auk and the Irish elk and other animals of the Glacial period. He can neither run nor fight.

Why was the herd preserved up to the present time? It was done under very peculiar circumstances, and I will call your attention briefly to the facts in connection with it.

With the discovery of these islands by the Russians, something over one hundred years ago, the seals were protected on shore. That Government spent some eighteen years sending out expeditions trying to find where the seals lived in the summer. Up to that time they were seen twice a year, going, like birds of passage, north to south in autumn, and south to north in spring or early summer, according to the season. About June or July millions of them would pass through the passes between the Aleutian Islands, passing northward into Bering Sea, while along in November millions would suddenly appear, passing into the Pacific.

Beyond that fact, until about one hundred years ago, no man knew where they were, either in the winter or summer. For eighteen years systematic explorations by the Russian Government were made, and they finally discovered the summer's habitat upon the Pribilof Islands. It then became possible to destroy the herd in the summer time when they went ashore, and this would have been the result but for regulations of the Russian Government. But until 1893 their winter habitat was unknown, and there is abundant evidence on that subject in the records of Congress.

Now, what did the British Government do? They sent three war vessels and one merchant steamer with instructions to follow the herd all winter in the Pacific Ocean and ascertain their location from time to time. Up to 1890 the seals were safe in the secrecy of their wanderings in the wide Pacific. But the English Government, coming to the assistance of their hunters and sailors, sent its navy out for the express purpose of following the seals and mapping out their route.

They did so, and they published those charts, which are now accessible to and used by every sealer in the Pacific. Mr. Hamlin, formerly Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, stated before the Committee on Ways and Means in the last Congress that he could now take these charts and tell within a few miles where that seal herd was every hour of the winter. With such charts as that, published by the English Government for the express purpose of informing their seamen and fishermen where the herd is, the herd is doomed. What a contrast do we exhibit to the English Government! Instead of coming to the assistance of our seamen in competition with other nations upon the high seas, we are proposing here to make it a criminal offense for one of our citizens to engage in an occupation which is lawful for every other citizen of the world.

We propose to make that criminal which is now lawful and commendable. The position that it is barbarous to hunt seals on the high seas is the merest fiction and sentiment. If that is the only foundation upon which we stand, the sooner we reexamine the foundation the better. True, a large percentage of the seals killed at sea are females, but since when did it become barbarous in hunting game to kill females? Since when did it become barbarous in buying and selling and butchering domestic animals to kill females as well as males? It does not apply to any other kind of game. It does not apply to any kind of domestic stock. Surely, there is nothing barbarous in taking the females as well as the males in a chase on the open sea, and why should there not be a larger percentage of females at sea than males, when only males are killed on shore? They are polygamists. The males have harems of forty or fifty members on the Pribilof Islands.

Our laws for twenty-six years have forbidden the killing of females on shore. For twenty years—1870 to 1890—the Alaska Commercial Company killed 100,000 males annually on the shore. Of course, the preponderance of females in the herd at sea would necessarily result from our own lawful killing of males upon the islands.

In 1874 Mr. Elliott, the expert of the Government, sent from the Smithsonian Institution, estimated there were 4,700,000 seals in the herd. In 1890 Mr. Elliott estimates only one-third as many. In 1895, in Mr. DINGLEY'S report from the Ways and Means Committee to this House, based upon the reports of our experts and resident agents of the Treasury Department, the herd was stated to contain only 175,500 individuals. Since then I have not the figures as to the estimates of the number existing in the herd, but I have very fair data from which we can draw the conclusion that the dwindling process has continued.

In 1896 the pelagic sealers of all nations got 43,000 skins, and on the land there were killed 30,000; total, 73,000. In the year 1897 the pelagic sealers got only 24,000 and the land catch amounted to only 20,000, or a total of 44,000 this year and 73,000 the year before. There were only about half as many caught this year as last year, although permission was given to the lessees of the Pribilof Islands to catch every killable seal that they could find this year. The evidence shows conclusively to my mind that the experts who met in Washington last October were right in saying that commercially the herd is now destroyed and that pelagic sealing is no longer profitable either to the Canadians or to us. I wish to read a little extract from the speech of one of these commissioners on his return to Canada:

TORONTO, November 27.

Sir Louis H. Davies, at a meeting of Liberals here last night, referred to his recent visit to Washington to attend the seal conference. He said:

"The seal experts settled the question of fact in such a way that hereafter it can not be opened up. We know exactly where we are. We know that the seal herd has diminished in an extraordinary degree in late years, but we know that pelagic sealing has diminished more than the herd and by a far greater percentage. We know, too, as a declaration of the experts of both countries, that there is no immediate danger of the extinction of the herd, and that the kind of pelagic sealing practiced by Canadian fishermen does not imperil or threaten the existence of the herd; and we know, further, that as a commercial venture it does not pay either country. That is about the sum and substance of the case."

Continuing, Sir Louis said it was pointed out to the Americans that Canada had taken her stand in reference to her tariff; had proclaimed and given effect to a preferential trade arrangement, and that the representatives could not enter into any agreement which should, directly or indirectly, prejudice the principle of preference. They were told that the right to catch seals being a national right, vindicated by the great Paris Tribunal as a legitimate industry on the part of British subjects, could not be disposed of for a mere money consideration; that Canada did not sell national rights for money, but that her representatives were willing that it should be treated as one of a number of those large questions and put, as it were, in the hodgepodge in the settlement.

If the United States could see their way clear to admit our lumber, to make coal reciprocally free on both sides, to make fish, salt and fresh, free, and such articles as barley, eggs, potatoes, and other things of that kind, an arrangement might be made which would be mutually profitable and satisfactory to both countries. Sir Wilfried Laurier had not surrendered one iota of Canadian rights or Canadian privileges.

That is the condition on which they will join us in forbidding pelagic sealing—namely, that we allow them to write our tariff laws. Now, I for one would be willing to let them go anywhere, without mentioning any particular place, rather than to allow them to write our tariff laws, especially when the condition which they offer us is that if they are allowed to write our tariff laws, then we shall have the privilege of being their servants in protecting a great British industry on the Pacific Ocean and another one in London.

The testimony in the records of the House shows conclusively that there are only 300 American citizens engaged in tanning, dressing, or dyeing these fur-seal skins, some in Albany and some in Brooklyn, and that only in an experimental way, while the evidence shows that from 2,000 to as high as 50,000 people are engaged in London in the same industry. This business of dressing seal skins and tanning and dyeing them is as distinctively a British industry as the making of pocketknives at Sheffield. I will put in the RECORD the evidence on this subject—unless some one wishes to see it—from volume 9, Report of Paris Tribunal, pages 581 and 583:

LOSS TO GREAT BRITAIN.

The business of dealing in fur-seal skins in the city of London has become an established and important industry. Deponent is informed that practically all the seal skins in the world are sold in London, and the number runs up in the year to between 100,000 and 200,000, averaging considerably over 150,000 a year. These skins are sold for the most part either by the firm of C. M. Lampson & Co., through their brokers, Goad, Rigg & Co., or by the firm of Culverwell, Brooks & Co. At the auction sales, which are advertised twice or three times in the year by these firms, skins are bought by dealers from all over the world, who are present either in person or by proxy.

The next stage in the industry is the dressing and dyeing of the furs, and practically the whole of these fur-seal skins sold in London are dressed and dyed in that city. The principal firms being engaged in that business are C. W. Martin & Sons and George Rice. Deponent's own firm dress a small number of skins and have dressed in one year as many as 23,000, and formerly dyed large numbers of skins, but do not now dye skins, as the secrets of the present fashionable color are now in the hands of other firms. After having been dressed and dyed, the skins of the fur seal are then passed into the hands of fur merchants, by whom in turn they are passed to furriers and drapers and retail dealers generally. Deponent estimates the total number of persons engaged in one way or another, directly or indirectly, in the fur-seal industry in the city of London at at least two or three thousand, many of whom are skilled laborers, all receiving high wages.

That a large amount of capital is also invested in the business in the city of London, and the precise value of the industry can be estimated by reckoning the amount expended in the various processes which deponent has enumerated upon each skin. For instance, after the skins arrive at the London market they are sold at the sales at prices which in the year 1890 averaged, say, 80 shillings apiece. The commissions on the selling of the goods, including warehousing, insurance, etc., deponent believes amounted to 6 per cent of the price obtained.

That the amount paid for dressing, dyeing, and machining each skin averages, say, 16 shillings. These processes take together about four or five months. The next expenditure upon the skin is, say, an average of 5 shillings at least for each skin for cutting up, and that thereafter there will be an average of at least from 3 shillings to 4 shillings per skin expended in quilting, lining, and making up the jackets or other garments, showing a total expenditure upon each skin for labor alone, in the city of London, of 25 shillings in addition to the percentage paid for brokerage, before the process of manufacture began, and the most of this money is actually paid out in wages.

Deponent says that in the above estimates he has given the bottom figures and that the amount actually expended upon the skins in the city of London undoubtedly averages a larger sum. This would make, on an average of 200,000 skins a year, which is not excessive, a total expenditure annually in the city of London of £250,000, minus the amounts paid for cutting and making up in respect to the skins sent to the United States.

[Alfred Fraser, page 558.]

Deponent says that the number of persons who are employed in the handling, dressing, dyeing, cutting, and manufacturing of seal skins in the city of London is about 2,000, many of whom are skilled laborers, earning as high as £3 or £4 a week. Deponent estimates the amount paid in the city of London for wages in the preparation of fur-seal skins for a manufacturer's uses, and excluding the wages of manufacturers' emyloyees, prior to the beginning of the pelagic sealing in 1885, at about £100,000 per annum.

A large capital, the amount of which, however, it would be difficult to estimate, is invested in the business of selling raw fur-seal skins. Two firms own large warehouses, and one of them expensive cold-storage vaults, portions of which are used exclusively for the purpose of storing fur-seal skins.

About seven firms are engaged in the dressing and dyeing of seal skins, of which a very much larger amount is done in London than in any other city in the world. In this branch of the fur-seal industry there are invested about £80,000 in permanent plant, which would become entirely useless if the seal-skin industry were to come to an end.

About 12,000 dressed and dyed Alaska fur-seal skins, which may be valued at £5 a skin, are annually manufactured into garments in London, and a very much larger proportion of Copper and Northwest Coast skins are so consumed.

The seal-skin industry furnishes occupation to workingmen in London as follows: To about 600 dressers and dyers; to about 1,400 cutters, nailers, sewers, and other laborers engaged in manufacturing seal-skin articles. Many of those employed as above are skilled laborers, who, in any other employment, would be but ordinary laborers. Some of them have been engaged in this industry from childhood. In the foregoing no account is taken of the numerous clerks, salesmen, and porters, of whom large numbers owe their means of support to the trade in fur-seal skins.

I believe that, in round numbers, the capital invested in this industry in London amounts to £1,000,000, and that when a full Alaska catch came to market the weekly amount expended in wages in connection with all the catches was about £2,500 or £3,000 a week.

[Sir G. C. Lampson, page 565.]

That the business at the present time has attained the rank of an important industry, in which there is embarked in the city of London a large amount of capital and upon which there is dependent a large number of workmen and employees.

The amount of capital from time to time invested in the business is correctly stated, deponent believes, by Mr. Teichmann, at as much as £1,000,000, and until within a year or two the numbers of persons depending upon the industry for their support has likewise been correctly stated by Mr. Teichmann, approximately at 2,000 persons, receiving on an average a weekly wage of 30 shillings, and most of them having families dependent upon their labors for their support.

[Sir G. C. Lampson, page 566.]

During the last two years the diminution and irregularity of the supply of fur and seal skins has caused some decrease in the amount of persons engaged in the industry, but deponent is not able to state exactly to what extent such decrease has taken place.

That deponent has made no examination of the books of his firm for the purpose of seeing precisely the number of skins annually dressed and dyed by his said firm and its predecessor, but it is the fact that his said firm in one year dressed 150,000 fur-seal skins, and of that number dyed 130,000, and it is also the fact that until within the last two years his firm dressed upward of 110,000 or 120,000 skins in each year and dyed upward of 100,000 skins so dressed.

The firm of C. W. Martin & Sons has employed until the last two years 500 persons, and employ at the present moment about 460 persons, most of whom are skilled laborers, receiving on an average at least 30 shillings a week, and most of whom have families dependent upon them for their support. Deponent estimates that the total number of persons employed directly or indirectly in the business of dressing, dyeing, handling, and cutting fur-seal skins up to within the last two years in the city of London was about 2,000.

[Henry Poland, page 571.]

The principal dressers and dyers of the city of London at the present time are C. W. Martin & Co. and George Rice, and skins are also dressed and dyed by other persons. The fur-seal business has attained very considerable dimensions in the city of London, large amounts of capital being invested therein, and probably in and about the city of London there are employed in the fur-seal skin business as many as 3,000 persons, most of whom are skilled hands, some of whom receive as high as £3 or £4 a week, and many if not most of whom have families dependent upon them for support.

That the business of handling and dealing in fur-seal skins has become, in the city of London, an established and important industry. That deponent himself, for instance, employs at the present time from 400 to 500 laborers, who are mostly engaged in one way or another upon fur-seal skins, many of whom are skilled workmen receiving good wages, and many of them having families dependent upon them for their support.

Deponent estimates the total number of people engaged in the business of handling, dyeing, dressing, and treating fur-seal skins up to the time the skins pass into the hands of the furriers at about 2,000. In addition to the numbers so employed, a much larger number of furriers, employees, and the employees of the retail merchants are concerned directly or indirectly in handling or manufacturing the fur-seal skins or fur-seal skin garments.

Deponent further says that a large amount of capital is in one way or another invested in the city of London in the business above enumerated.

That the fur-seal skin business had become an important industry in the city of London, in which a large amount of capital was invested and a large number of workmen employed, amounting, including the dressers, dyers, handlers, and persons employed in the manufactories of the furriers, to about 3,000. It is difficult to make any correct estimate of the number of people so employed, but deponent says that he has recently had occasion to look into the question in his capacity as master of the Skinners' Company and he believes the above figure to be substantially correct.

That a large number of persons so employed are skilled laborers and most of them have families dependent upon their labors for their support. The wages paid in some cases are as high as £3 or £4 a week, and perhaps the average wages of the whole number may be safely estimated at £1 per week. That many of these persons know no other business than that in which they are at present engaged.

A very large amount of capital is invested in the Kingdom of Great Britain in the business. It is, in deponent's judgment, fair to estimate the amount of capital invested in the business in one way or another to have been at times as much as £1,000,000, and that there have been until lately dependent upon this industry, in the city of London, about 2,000 skilled workmen, most of whom have families dependent upon them for support, and the amount of wages paid to those people deponent estimates on the average at about 30 shillings per week, making an aggregate of £150,000 per annum.

Deponent further says that the number of persons who are engaged in the handling, dressing, and dyeing of seal skins in Great Britain is about 2,000, many of whom are expert workmen and receive high wages; and the number in the United States is about 300. The number of persons engaged upon the poaching vessels is about 10 to each vessel, and a considerable number of the persons engaged upon the Canadian sealers are American citizens.

Every one of these skins is carried to London, there to be tanned, dyed, and otherwise prepared for market. They are worthless in the condition in which they are caught. Up to about 1870 they were commercially worthless. They were in fashion only in China, and never brought a high price, say from 50 cents to $5 apiece. The value of a seal skin depends not on its original intrinsic worth, but on the whims of fashion, and the art that adds the chief value is a trade secret, mostly in dyeing the skins. Seal-skin garments, when made up ready for wear, have no resemblance in appearance to seals in the ocean or skins before they are clipped and colored.

Mr. STEELE. Some are prepared in Buffalo, are they not? I think they have an establishment, quite a large one, there.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. There may be, though that must have been established since 1893.

Mr. STEELE. It might have been.

Mr. McCLEARY. You said there were about 300 in this country, perhaps.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Yes; that is the testimony of C. O. Williams before the Paris Tribunal. I will read some of the evidence on the subject of this being distinctly a British industry.

Mr. STEELE. A very large percentage of them, no doubt, are cured and colored in London.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. On this subject C. O. Williams makes this statement:

Deponent further says that the number of persons who are engaged in the handling, dressing, and dyeing of seal skins in Great Britain is about 2,000, many of whom are expert workmen and receive high wages, and the number in the United States is about 300. (Volume 9, page 584.)

Here is the testimony of Arthur Hirschel:

I believe that, in round numbers, the capital invested in this industry in London amounts to £1,000,000, and that when a full Alaska catch came to market, the weekly amount expended in wages in connection with all the catches was about £2,500 or £3,000 a week. (Volume 9, page 582.)

Sir G. C. Lamson testifies to the same effect, and his testimony is reported on the same page as that of Hirschel.

I think there will be no dispute on that point, that it is a British industry and not an American industry. Most of the money is made in London. Most of the money that constitutes the value of the seal skin is paid out in wages in the city of London, where the trade secret is held for dyeing these skins and making them valuable.

I will not take the time to repeat the various items of the expenses incident to tanning, dressing, and dyeing these skins, but the foregoing testimony of H. S. Bevington shows the average expense for labor in London is 25 shillings per skin. Now, the amount paid out for the fur skin is enhanced much more than the amount paid in wages. It would be very interesting to know the amount of money earned in wages in America by labor expended on these skins before they get to London.

My duties as such superintendent demanded that I should be thoroughly conversant with all the details of shipping and transporting seal skins taken, and the necessary expenses incurred by my employers. From my knowledge of such expenditures I herewith submit the following statement in relation to the cost of putting the annual quota of skins obtained on the Pribilof Islands upon the market when a hundred thousand seals are killed, and I believe such statement to be practically correct:

Maintenance of island establishments	$12,000
Salaries of employees (exclusive of natives)	12,000
Transportation to San Francisco	15,000
Transportation, San Francisco to New York	20,000
Transportation, New York to London	6,000
Insurance, $1,400,000 at 1 per cent	14,000
Commission for selling, 2½ per cent of $1,500,000	37,500
Storage, cooperage, twine, salt, etc	15,500
Interest on the plant, 10 per cent of $100,000	10,000
Annual rental paid to Government, per terms of lease	60,000
Obligations of the lease for fish, fuel, medicines, etc	25,000
Supervision of business from San Francisco	20,000
First cost of skins to natives	40,000
Cost of 100,000 skins delivered in London, sold	287,000

Here is the estimate of the superintendent of the Alaska Commercial Company. The entire cost of the fur-seal skins laid down in London is given and shows what a miserable pittance of it goes to any American laboring man. The largest item that goes to any American laboring man is the $20,000 earned by the railroads between San Francisco and New York in carrying these skins to the London market, and that is about all that American labor gets out of it.

The total expenditure sums up $287,000; that is, those skins cost this company when laid down in London $2.87 apiece, and they sell for $30 apiece. Now, how much of this $287,000 is paid out in wages to American workingmen?

Maintenance of island establishments, $12,000.

This statement is not itemized, and there may be some American laborers there, employed to keep the boats and buildings in repair.

Salaries of employees (exclusive of natives), $12,000.

There are only seven or eight of those employees.

Transportation to San Francisco, $15,000.

I think this man is trying to make as extravagant a statement as he can of what it costs his company to lay down these skins in London. The skins are all loaded into one boat and carried from the islands to San Francisco at one trip. From 1875 to 1890 the company carried off only one boat load a year. They had a number of trading posts in the Alaska country. They owned their own steamboat. They loaded their boat with merchandise in San Francisco and made the round of these posts, and on their way home they dumped the entire 100,000 seal skins into the hold of the steamer and carried them to San Francisco. There may be some American citizens employed as sailors on that boat, but very few. I doubt very much if it would have cost the company $15,000 if they had paid regular freight rates on another boat.

Transportation, San Francisco to New York, $20,000.

Is it reasonable to believe that it cost only $20,000 to transport these skins from San Francisco to New York by railroad, and that it cost almost as much to bring them on the company's own boat from the Pribilof Islands to San Francisco? I will admit that of this $20,000 paid to the railroads some part, but only a very small part, has gone to a few American laborers, the brakemen and others employed on the railroad, but those are the only American laborers who will get any considerable part of the money disbursed by the company as expenses on the skins before they are sold in London.

Transportation, New York to London, $6,000.
Commission for selling, etc., $37,500.

That $37,500 goes to the brokers in London, and the $6,000 is probably earned by some steamer carrying a flag other than ours.

Storage, etc. (in London?), $15,500.
Annual rental paid Government, per terms of lease, $60,000.

That looks very nice on paper, and would be so if the Government got it, but the trouble is we do not get it. We simply get the right to sue these men. Although their contract requires them to pay that money into the Treasury every year as rental, and a lot more besides, how much of it did we get last year? Not a dollar. How much did we get the year before? Not a shilling. How much the year before? Not a sou. How much in 1893? Not a rupee. We have to go back to 1892 before we can hear the clink of their dollars falling into the Federal Treasury, and even in that remote year of grace they lacked $108,686.52 of paying the annual rental and dues stipulated in the contract.

Here is a copy of a contract between the United States and the North American Commercial Company, under which said company is granted the exclusive right of taking fur seals upon the Pribilof Islands in Alaska:

This indenture, made in duplicate this 12th day of March, 1890, by and between William Windom, Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, in pursuance of chapter 3 of Title XXIII, Revised Statutes, and the North American Commercial Company, a corporation duly established under the laws of the State of California, and acting by I. Liebes, its president, in accordance with a resolution of said corporation adopted at a meeting of its board of directors held January 4, 1890:

Witnesseth, that the said Secretary of the Treasury, in consideration of the agreements hereinafter stated, hereby leases to the said North American Commercial Company for a term of twenty years from the 1st day of May, 1890, the exclusive right to engage in the business of taking fur seals on the islands of St. George and St. Paul, in the Territory of Alaska, and to send a vessel or vessels to said islands for the skins of such seals.

The said North American Commercial Company, in consideration of the rights secured to it under this lease above stated, on its part covenants and agrees to do the things following, that is to say:

To pay to the Treasurer of the United States each year during the said term of twenty years, as annual rental, the sum of $60,000, and in addition thereto agrees to pay the revenue tax or duty of $2 laid upon each fur-seal skin taken and shipped by it from said islands of St. George and St. Paul, and also to pay to said Treasurer the further sum of $7.62½ apiece for each and every fur-seal skin taken and shipped from said islands, and also to pay the sum of 50 cents per gallon for each gallon of oil sold by it made from seals that may be taken on said islands during the said period of twenty years, and to secure the prompt payment of the $60,000 rental above referred to, the said company agrees to deposit with the Secretary of the Treasury bonds of the United States to the amount of $50,000, face value, to be held as a guaranty for the annual payment of said $60,000 rental, the interest thereon when due to be collected and paid to the North American Commercial Company, provided the said company is not in default of payment of any part of the said $60,000 rental.

That it will furnish to the native inhabitants of said islands of St. George and St. Paul annually such quantity or number of dried salmon and such quantity of salt and such number of salt barrels for preserving their necessary supply of meat as the Secretary of the Treasury shall from time to time determine.

That it will also furnish to the said inhabitants 80 tons of coal annually, and a sufficient number of comfortable dwellings in which said native inhabitants may reside; and will keep said dwellings in proper repair; and will also provide and keep in repair such suitable schoolhouses as may be necessary, and will establish and maintain during eight months of each year proper schools for the education of the children on said islands, the same to be taught by competent teachers, who shall be paid by the company a fair compensation, all to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury; and will also provide and maintain a suitable house for religious worship; and will also provide a competent physician or physicians, and necessary and proper medicines and medical supplies; and will also provide the necessaries of life for the widows and orphans and aged and infirm inhabitants of said islands who are unable to provide for themselves; all of which foregoing agreements will be done and performed by the said company free of all costs and charges to said native inhabitants of said islands or to the United States.

The annual rental, together with all other payments to the United States, provided for in this lease, shall be made and paid on or before the 1st day of April of each and every year during the existence of this lease, beginning with the 1st day of April, 1891.

The said company further agrees to employ the native inhabitants of said islands to perform such labor upon the islands as they are fitted to perform, and to pay therefor a fair and just compensation, such as may be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury; and also agrees to contribute, as far as in its power, all reasonable efforts to secure the comfort, health, education, and promote the morals and civilization of said native inhabitants.

The said company also agrees faithfully to obey and abide by all rules and regulations that the Secretary of the Treasury has heretofore or may hereafter establish or make in pursuance of law concerning the taking of seals on said islands, and concerning the comfort, morals, and other interests of said inhabitants, and all matters pertaining to said islands and the taking of seals within the possession of the United States. It also agrees to obey and abide by any restrictions or limitations upon the right to kill seals that the Secretary of the Treasury shall judge necessary, under the law, for the preservation of the seal fisheries of the United States; and it agrees that it will not kill, or permit to be killed, so far as it can prevent, in any year a greater number of seals than is authorized by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The said company further agrees that it will not permit any of its agents to keep, sell, give, or dispose of any distilled spirits or spirituous liquors or opium on either of said islands or the waters adjacent thereto to any of the native inhabitants of said islands, such person not being a physician and furnishing the same for use as a medicine.

It is understood and agreed that the number of fur seals to be taken and killed for their skins upon said islands by the North American Commercial Company during the year ending May 1, 1891, shall not exceed 60,000.

The Secretary of the Treasury reserves the right to terminate this lease and all rights of the North American Commercial Company under the same at any time on full and satisfactory proof that the said company has violated any of the provisions and agreements of this lease, or in any of the laws of the United States, or any Treasury regulation respecting the taking of fur seals or concerning the islands of St. George and St. Paul or the inhabitants thereof.

In witness whereof the parties hereto have set their hands and seals the day and year above written.

(Signed) WILLIAM WINDOM,
Secretary of the Treasury.
NORTH AMERICAN COMMERCIAL COMPANY,
(Signed by) I. LIEBES,
President of the North American Commercial Company.

Instead of the $60,000 rental, $7.62½ royalty, and $2 per skin revenue tax which they contracted to pay, they actually paid in 1892 only $23,000. How much did we get in 1891? Forty-three thousand dollars only, out of the $180,000 due the United States for that year. Seventy thousand dollars is the sum total that we have received since the islands were leased to the present company, in 1890. We have paid out over half a million dollars in a single year for policing Bering Sea to protect these men.

We have paid out over $2,500,000 in the last seven years to protect them, and they have paid us only $70,000. But, Mr. Speaker, if it was only money that we had thrown into this hopper, I would not complain so much. But we have also thrown the honor of the country into this vortex. When Ole Bull went to Russia to play before the Czar, he was met in the anteroom by a pompous bandmaster, and this dialogue took place:

BANDMASTER. Where is your fiddle?
OLE BULL. I left it at my hotel.
BANDMASTER. Didn't you know that the object of this meeting was to have you play to me in order that I might judge of the fitness of your music for the Czar to hear?
OLE BULL. I play either for money or for honor. Playing before you would involve neither.

[Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, do we occupy a less dignified position as a great Government than that of a strolling fiddler? We ought to play either for money or for honor. Surely there is no more money in it. These men who promised to pay us enormous sums of money annually are like the receiver of a suspended bank out in my country, who had the reputation of being a perfect success as a receiver, but a total failure as a disburser. What hope is there to restore the seal herd? None. It is just as dim and distant and visionary as the hope of restoring the wolf herds on the prairies of Illinois, and more so.

Wolf herds have been cultivated for the bounties on their scalps and preserved and encouraged and restored; but seal herds never. And think of the humiliation and disgrace of the thing. There we went over to Paris and surrendered our rights in the face of the world. And what did that cost us? A quarter of a million for expenses, and nobody knows how much in damages. Let me read you a few items showing what it cost us to make that surrender, the surrender being conducted by some of the same men who are now at the head of these negotiations.

Mr. John W. Foster, who was our agent at the Paris Tribunal, is the same man who is now the so-called expert seal commissioner representing us—having a roving commission—with authority to incur unlimited expenses, going last summer to Japan and Russia, after being refused a hearing, first by Pauncefote in Washington, and later by Salisbury in London. This man, who is making a nice fat living out of "experting" for us, may have drawn this bill in the State Department or the Treasury Department. He is an expert at surrendering; that is what he is. He got $15,000 for going to Paris on a junketing expedition to surrender our rights. And he did it. He made such a great reputation at surrendering that when at the close of the war between China and Japan it became necessary for the Chinese to surrender, they sent for this past master of the art of surrendering and paid him $100,000, I am told, for showing Li Hung Chang how great nations surrender gracefully. [Laughter.] And now we have employed this accomplished master of the art of surrendering to show us how to give up our few remaining rights upon the high seas.

Let me give you some of the items of expense at the Paris Tribunal. We had two arbitrators. They were holding offices in the United States, drawing salaries for the discharge of their official duties. I do not blame them for taking what the laws of their country gave them; but are you and I blameless, who let the Executive Departments seduce us into passing such a law? John M. Harlan, then and now a justice of the Supreme Court, received $13,000; JOHN P. MORGAN, then and now a Senator of the United States, received $13,373.76; and I think he was worth $373.76 more than the judge was. [Laughter.] These amounts, $13,000 apiece, were drawn by these men, be it remembered, in addition to all their expenses, and in addition to their regular salaries—the one as judge of the Supreme Court, the other as Senator.

Now I come to the lawyers. I was once a lawyer myself; but since I have been in Congress I have not practiced, so I feel free to say things, even if they are not exactly "for the good of the order." Here is one item:

James C. Carter, $15,000; special appropriation, $15,000.

That made $30,000 for this lawyer.

E. J. Phelps, $16,000; special appropriation, $15,000.

That made $31,000 for Mr. Phelps. Thirty thousand dollars apiece to two obscure lawyers struggling to make a living down there in the swamps of New Jersey and New York. If such lawyers as Mr. DALZELL, of Pennsylvania, or Mr. DOLLIVER, of Iowa, both of whom I see before me, had been employed, I should not object to their getting $30,000 apiece for a summer vacation jaunt over in Paris, because I know they always earn whatever retainers they get, and I believe they would have won our case. And then I am sure they would both find Paris a delightful place to visit, with their expenses paid from other people's money. [Laughter.]

Henry W. Blodgett, $12,000.
Frederic R. Coudert, $15,000—and so on—$106,396.02 for lawyer fees alone.

I admit that another international commission might be profitable to a few individual American citizens, statesmen, and others in and out of jobs. I append the following itemized statement of expenses of the Tribunal of Arbitration of Paris:

I do not wonder that these men and their friends who have been drawing these enormous fees in addition to their regular salaries for going on junketing trips should be in favor of keeping up this farce, from which the Government is drawing not a dollar. And we are paying out millions and millions without discussion in this House simply on the faith of some expert who has got some Secretary to sign his papers, or has received the sanction of some great committee, without investigation by us. Why, gentlemen, do you remember that last Friday evening when this bill was first called up it was about to go through upon the supposition that the Ways and Means Committee had unanimously reported it, when the fact was that the Ways and Means Committee had held only one meeting this session—on the 7th of December—while this bill was introduced on the 8th and called up on the 10th, and when, in fact, the Ways and Means Committee had never considered it? My friend from Illinois [Mr. HITT] has now explained how that happened.

There appears to have been a blunder. But do not gentlemen see that these blunders may sometimes be very costly if bills are allowed to slip through on the strength of them? If I had not objected at that time, you and I and all of us would have gone on record as saying, "Oh, well, we are members of Congress charged with the great duty of looking after the interest of the people; but we will throw the responsibility on the great Committee on Ways and Means, who have carefully considered this business; it is easier for us to throw the responsibility on that committee than to examine the matter for ourselves." Is such a method of proceeding right? Is that what you and I are sent here for?

Mr. HITT. The gentleman will perhaps remember that I did not mention the Ways and Means Committee, but another committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Well, sir, in that regard I was somewhat puzzled. We recently spent two days here arguing whether a member has a right to change the RECORD as to a single word when the printed word was not the word he intended to use. In this case I was listening, and I thought the member said "Ways and Means," and so it was printed in the RECORD; but I now believe the gentleman said "Foreign Affairs." We have, however, established a precedent which forbids us to change the RECORD. [Laughter.] I know the gentlemen on this side of the House will stand by the recent decision of this House. [Laughter.] The RECORD shows—page 102—that the Ways and Means Committee unanimously reported this bill, when in fact we had not heard of the bill, or even had a meeting since its introduction in the House.

Mr. DALZELL. He intended to say so. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Well, I should not have made the explanation, except that one of the greatest seal experts in the United States, who has done really valuable service in this cause for very small pay, has written to me, seemingly misled by the RECORD, and evidently believing that the committee of which such men as DOLLIVER, DALZELL, and the presiding officer for the moment [Mr. DINGLEY] were members have given their approval to such a monstrous bill.

But let us go a little further into the items of this junketing trip to Paris to surrender our rights there. "John W. Foster, agent, $15,000. Traveling expenses, hotel bills, etc., $6,219." [Laughter.] "Clerical service, $8,000; ocean travel, $1,594."

Mr. ARNOLD. For whom?

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. For the arbitrators, lawyers, clerks, paymaster, etc.

Mr. McCLEARY. Only $1,000?

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Well, $1,594 for "ocean transportation." That is probably the amount that they paid for the steamer tickets. But now let me call your attention to the next item. "To the Hotel Continental, Paris, $8,764." That is in addition to the traveling expenses and the hotel bills. [Great laughter.] The next item is $18,000 for printing, and that, I suppose, is all right. But the traveling expenses, hotel bills, having amounted to $6,219, we have here a further hotel bill at the Hotel Continental of $8,764. I suppose this must have been a banquet of some kind at the hotel. [Laughter.]

I suppose the "negotiations" had to be conducted in Europe in that manner. It was probably necessary to keep up the industry. This fur was originally made fashionable throughout the world by a very large expenditure of money in all of the leading capitals of Europe. This is a fact which is manifest from the record. The Congressional committee of 1876 reported "every art and appliance and much money have been expended in the cultivation of a taste for seal-skin furs, which the Alaska Commercial Company had almost the exclusive control of." Later in the record an officer of that company testifies that the expenditures were made in "London, Paris, Berlin, Vienna, and elsewhere."

It is true that the fashion was created by a conspiracy of the Alaskan Fur Seal Company and the men who had the monopoly of dressing and dyeing the skins in London. They created the fashion by spending large sums of money, and probably giving away a number of seal-skin coats to Berlin, London, Paris, Vienna, "and elsewhere," as the record shows. [Laughter.] If they had stricken out "elsewhere" and put in "Washington," wouldn't that have been dreadful? [Great laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, it costs money to get up any kind of a fashion. The fashion depends generally upon the whims and the notions, the ideas, and the styles adopted by the women. There must have been a great many of the seal-skin coats transported and delivered, free of cost, in order to create and maintain the fashions in the leading fashionable centers—Paris, Berlin, London, Vienna, and "elsewhere." [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MITCHELL. Do you not think that it is rather a dangerous matter for us to discuss at such length just before the holiday season?

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Now the gentleman wants to ask me if I do not endanger the good will of the ladies of North Dakota who wear seal-skin coats. I will tell you that I do not intend to prevent them from getting, every one of them, a present of a seal-skin coat this Christmas or the next Christmas, if it is possible. But I do tell you that if you will join with me now in creating a sentiment which will control this question and exterminate the seals next summer, when they go ashore on the Pribilof Islands, seal skins will be as cheap next summer as sheep skins in the stock yards of Chicago, and every one of them can have a seal-skin or a sheep-skin coat, just as she may prefer. [Laughter.]

Mr. ADAMS. But they might be cold in the meantime?

A MEMBER. Why not wear buffalo robes? [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Fifteen years ago it was feared that the extermination of the buffalo would cause great suffering, but other furs have taken the place.

Let us look at the matter from a practical standpoint. These seals live on fish. They are in competition with the starving miners of the Klondike region, who want fish for food, or any other kind of food that is accessible. The seals, it is estimated, consume some 50,000,000 pounds of fish per day. The bulk of them stand guard during the spawning season at the mouths of the rivers and the bays where the smelt, the cod, the herring, the salmon, and the halibut enter the rivers, and are destroyed in countless millions by the seals. These animals depredate in this manner along the whole Pacific coast from Los Angeles to the end of Alaska.

The evidence is here that their appearance on the Pacific coast is coincident with the coming of these fish. There may be a dispute as to what these animals live on. Mr. Jordan, in his preliminary report to us last year, stated on page 12 of that report that these animals feed on fish. I understand he has telegraphed since to members of the House, or that the statement has reached the members of the House from him, that they do not feed on food-fish. Therefore this is a live question. I will go into that. I will read what Mr. Jordan himself says on page 12 of his report:

> Beyond the fact that both the fur seal and hair seal are carniverous mammals, feeding on fish and adapted for life in the water, the two types have little in common.

That was what Mr. Jordan said in 1896. Now, what does Mr. Hamlin tell us now? He is one of these expert roving commissioners. What did he say when he was before our committee in February, 1896? He then said they live largely on cod. Here is the testimony of Mr. Hamlin when he was before our committee:

> They live largely on cod, and the cod fisheries of Alaska are inexhaustible, practically the greatest cod fisheries in the world.

It is well enough to talk about throwing away our food resources and to say that they are inexhaustible, but this very hour we have voted $250,000 of the people's money to send food into those very regions where food would come up the Yukon and Columbia and Frazer and McKenzie rivers to the very neighborhood of these miners if it were not for these voracious animals that stand guard at the mouths of the rivers, destroying the female fish when they are about to go into shoal waters to deposit their eggs. These voracious seals are guilty of the very crime which the pelagic sealers are charged with, that of destroying gravid females.

But for that destruction there should have been no occasion to vote this money to carry provisions to the miners starving in Alaska. If unobstructed by the seals millions of the finest food fish in the world would swim into the very camps of the miners. But for this provision there would be no need for me to pay railroad freight on salmon in North Dakota from the Pacific Ocean. Those fish would come up the Columbia River nearly to the wheat fields of North Dakota, right up into the mining camps of Montana, if you would only leave them alone or destroy their natural enemies, the seals. The gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] made the statement on the floor of this House last Friday that the seals eat more fish in one year than all the furs ever created are worth. Here is a clipping from the Evening Star of December 7:

SEALS AND SALMON.

A. K. Peterson, who has been fishing in the Fraser River, says that the pack of fish there and in Alaska is large, and that the cannery men have really more fish than they know what to do with. On the Sound fishing is still going on, and the amount of second-grade fish packed will be enormous.

Mr. Peterson says the fishermen on the Fraser River and in Alaska attribute the increased amount of fish caught yearly to the killing off of the seal herds by pelagic sealing. As the fish seem to be increasing instead of diminishing, notwithstanding the vast quantities caught, there may be something in this theory. The hair seals, which frequent the mouth of the Columbia, eat salmon and kill lots of them, and probably the fur seal does the same.

A good, healthy seal should eat a salmon a day, or two or three of the blue backs they catch in the Fraser and in Alaska. The immense herds of seal which go up to the Bering Sea every year consume vast numbers. If the herd of sea lions which have their headquarters at Seal Rocks, just south of False Tillamook, were exterminated, the number of fat Chinook salmon coming into the Columbia would be greatly increased.—Portland Oregonian.

In the report of the British commissioners we have authority on this subject. They also sent commissioners to the Bering Sea preparatory to the Paris Tribunal. On page 39 of their report I find the following:

> Such rights, however, do not depend on position only, but also on the fact that the seals necessarily derive their sustenance from the fish which frequent these waters, which, if not thus consumed by the seals, would be available for capture by the people of the adjacent coasts.

Our fishermen now report, as stated in the Star of this city, that there has been an enormous increase in the food-fish in Alaska, and they believe the reason is on account of the assistance that the pelagic sealers have rendered to our fishermen by destroying these natural enemies of the sea food that properly and legitimately belongs to our people in that region.

Now, here is another authority on this same subject, the report of our agent, on page 22. Here is an abstract of the evidence as to what these animals live on:

NOTES ON THE FOOD OF SEALS.

Captain Tood says the food of seals taken near the mainland consists largely of salmon, and that this is true of the Japan and Copper Island sealing grounds as well as of the North American coast.

Captain Magnesen, of the steamer Walter Earle, reports the seals taken on August 25, 1894 (latitude 56° 13′, longitude 172° 44′), as feeding on salmon.

Capt. S. Balcom, of the sealer Walter Rich, reported taking salmon occasionally from the stomachs of seal speared in Bering Sea in August, 1894.

Capt. H. F. Sieward, of the sealer Mascot, in 1894, collected the stomachs of three seals, containing pollock apparently, at the following position: Latitude north 56° 10′, longitude west 171° 45′; August 28, latitude north 58° 01′, longitude west 173° 29′; latitude north 58° 02′, longitude west 172° 45′, September 8.

Captain Sieward writes that other seals opened at the first position contained nothing but squid, and at the second position cod and squid; but it is possible that the fish observed were pollock, which closely resemble cod.

I read from Professor Elliott's report to the Government, on page 61, on this same subject:

> What an immense quantity of finny prey must pass down their voracious throats as every year rolls by. A creature so full of life, strung with nerves, and muscles like bands of steel, can not live on air or absorb it from the sea. Their food is fish, to the practical exclusion of all other diet.
> I have never seen them touch, or disturb with the intention of touching it, one solitary example in the flocks of water fowl which rest upon the surface of the water all about the islands. I was especially careful in noting this, because it seemed to me that the canine armature of their mouths must suggest flesh for food at times as well as fish; but fish we know they eat. Whole windrows of the heads of cod and wolf fishes, bitten off by these animals at the nape, were washed up on the south shore of St. George during a gale in the summer of 1873. This pelagic decapitation evidently marked the progress and the appetite of a band of fur seals to the windward of the island as they passed into and through a stray school of these fishes.
> How many pounds per diem is required by an adult seal and taken by it when feeding is not certain in my mind. Judging from the appetite, however, of kindred animals, such as sea lions fed in confinement at Woodward's Gardens, San Francisco, I can safely say that 40 pounds for a full-grown fur seal is a fair allowance, with at least 10 or 12 pounds per diem to every adult female, and not much less, if any, to the rapidly growing pups and young holluschickie.
> Therefore this great body of 4,000,000 or 5,000,000 of hearty, active animals which we know on the seal islands must consume an enormous amount of such food every year. They can not average less than 10 pounds of fish each per diem, which gives the consumption, as exhibited by their appetite, of over 6,000,000 tons of fish every year. What wonder, then, that nature should do something to hold these active fishermen in check?

These seals go 5,000 miles from the shore. They are found in the very center of the Pacific Ocean, and when there they are the common property of mankind. Not so with the fish. They are never found in mid-ocean. If fish go far from the shore they can not there be caught. We control the shores. We have 36,000 miles of shore line in Alaska.

The fisheries would be ours without question or competition. We should have there, as Assistant Commissioner Hamlin, now Seal Expert Hamlin, said in 1896, "the greatest cod fishery in the world." And the only reason why we do not have the use of that fishery at the present time is because we have set aside that part of our ocean domain as a reserve to feed these seals on. It was all right in 1870 and to 1890 to abandon this enormous supply suitable for human food, and the finest food in the world. We had then no use for it; but the time has come when thousands of our young men from the Eastern, Southern, and Western States are flocking into that country. They must have something to eat there. It is not an agricultural country. It is not a dairy country. Never will be. Fish food must always be the "piece de resistance" of the menu there. We find ourselves making appropriations in midwinter to send Laplanders and reindeer to carry provisions to these starving men.

I beg of you to adopt an ordinary, reasonable, and sensible course, and let our pelagic sealers enjoy the rights that citizens of all other countries enjoy, and these seals will become exterminated, or at least so reduced in numbers as to be less harmful, and the fish would go up the rivers thousands of miles without any freight bills attached to their fins, and become abundant and wholesome food for our citizens who are now bravely venturing into that country.

There is another fact which I wish to call the attention of the House to. The British commissioners have expressed a thought which I wish our commissioners had appreciated. In their report, on page 26, they say:

> The United States have for many years past endeavored to build up a native maritime industry.
> In this pelagic sealing they undoubtedly have on the Pacific coast a useful nursery for seamen.

This was in 1893. They appreciated the idea that that industry was a lawful and legitimate one, unless you brand it as a crime; a useful and necessary school for our seamen. Now you propose by a criminal statute to drive our men and our capital from that industry.

The Secretary, in the letter which was read by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, has well stated that the effect of passing this law will not be to withdraw American capital from the industry, but simply to drive it under the British flag. Now, as to the capital invested in these vessels, which has been paid out by the parties who have carried on this industry, if these vessels were disposed of they would necessarily be sold to Canadians, to Japanese, or to Russians. That is the only effect of it, so far as that property is concerned. I have never known that the industry of our merchant marine upon the high seas was so large and flourishing that you could afford to destroy any portion of it.

Is our merchant marine really so flourishing that we can afford to drive this little fleet of 15 schooners under the protection of the Union Jack? I am not prepared to vote for it. What will become of the trained hunters and sailors on board of these ships? It is an avocation that requires great skill. They are protected now by our laws and by the decision of the Tribunal of Paris. They are bound to provide for themselves and their families.

They are just as honorable men as we are. They do no more harm than we do when we shoot wild geese and ducks. When we shoot geese and ducks, we wound and destroy a great many more than we get, and make no distinction of sex. This is an incident to any character of hunting, and it is no more cruel to hunt seal than it is to hunt any other kind of wild game.

Those men are at this time lawfully engaged in that business. Now, I appeal to the lawyers in this House to answer this question: Do you believe that we should here, under the suspension of the rules and with scant discussion, add enormously to the scope of our criminal statutes, making that punishable by fine, imprisonment, and confiscation which is now honorable and praiseworthy?

Do you not think, my friends, that in your own States many of the legislatures have gone too fast and too far in the direction of making naturally innocent acts criminal by statute, and do you think that we ought to take this step, especially when no other nation has done it? And if we did, would it have the effect of diminishing the number of seals killed or the number of men engaged in the occupation? Not at all. It would simply have the effect of driving out the fifteen ships that we had in the business last year to make place for fifteen Canadian ships.

It would simply have the effect of withdrawing the 150 American citizens who were engaged in that business last year and making place for 150 Canadians or citizens of other countries. It would not stop pelagic sealing at all.

But gentlemen say we are in an awkward position when we meet the commissioners from foreign countries. In the RECORD this morning appears a letter which was read in the Senate yesterday, in which it was stated that in the October conference in Washington there was an agreement between the representatives of Japan, Russia, and the United States that those three nations would stop pelagic sealing whenever Great Britain would agree to do the same. That seems reasonable. Beyond that we ought never to go.

The Canadians have said very frankly and firmly that the only condition upon which they will join that alliance is that we shall repeal or modify our tariff law. If this had come to you, as plain, hard-headed, sensible men, would not you have said that a sensible arrangement would be this: Let us Americans, Canadians, Russians, Englishmen, and Japanese all agree mutually to stop pelagic sealing at the same time, if we intend to stop it at all. That would be sensible, and that is what ought to be done.

Mr. BRUCKER. What other nations do prohibit pelagic sealing?

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. None. It is now lawful to the people of every nation. Of course it is said that if we should enter into an agreement with Russia, Japan, and England, the agreement of those four nations would stop it. But I do not know; I do not think so; and I will tell you why. This expert commission of ours takes the ground that, although we were beaten before the Paris Tribunal, where we made the foolish contention that Bering Sea was a closed sea and that we had a right of property in the seals at sea, they say that while, after that decision, we are estopped as to England, we have not arbitrated the question with other nations, and that the estoppel can not be pleaded by other nations. Now, how undignified and unmanly that is. In the first place, representatives of certain other nations were officially present at the conference. I read the names of some of them:

> Baron Alphonse de Courcel, French senator, the arbitrator named by France; Marquis E. Visconti Venosta, senator of Italy, arbitrator named by Italy; Mr. Gregres Gram, the arbitrator named by the King of Norway and Sweden.

We went before that high tribunal and were defeated.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from North Dakota be extended until he concludes his remarks. This discussion is very valuable.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. I thank the gentleman and the House. Mr. Speaker, if we were to take that position, we would of course claim that the question was not settled at Paris, except as between us and Great Britain. I repeat, how unmanly and undignified that would be! As soon as the English and the American and the Japanese and the Russian ships were withdrawn, do you suppose that a valuable industry of that kind, which pays millions into the pockets of somebody, would not be resorted to immediately by the ships of other nations, who all have the right to navigate the high seas? The Paris Tribunal decided, in the face of all the world, that the Bering Sea is an open sea.

The Paris Tribunal decided, in the face of all the world, that we had no right of property or protection in these animals except within the 3-mile limit. Nothing would be more natural than that some little country like Portugal or Norway, for instance, would immediately send ships and men there to engage in the business. Do you suppose that a little country like Norway, for instance, having the third largest merchant marine in the world, would allow such a source of wealth to long lie idle after these four great nations had withdrawn from the competition? And would we be in a position to say to Norway or to Portugal or to Haiti: "We will take from you by force the rights which you claim upon the high seas and which have been declared to exist at least as against us by the Paris Tribunal?" This country is not ruled by an emperor who can send his school-ships to threaten and bully smaller powers.

We base our national policy on the eternal principles of right and justice, and we concede the same right to the weak as to the strong. We might have fought England in 1892 and 1893 when her armed cruisers and ours were in Bering Sea, their cannons and ours loaded to the muzzle. If we had then, unfortunately, come into collision I for one would cheerfully have voted to pay any amount of war expenses, for I believe in my country, right or wrong; but after we have once submitted this question to a great international tribunal and have agreed to be bound by its decision, and after that tribunal has decided against us, I for one would not vote a dime to pay the expenses of preventing any of the smaller maritime powers from sending their men and ships into those seas to profit by this business.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question for information?

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. I understand that this Government farms out to a corporation the privilege of killing those seals on land?

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Yes, sir; on the islands.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. I am informed that that corporation owes the Government about one million and a quarter of dollars——

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. More than that.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. And has refused to pay it.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Yes, and has refused to pay it.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. Is it not also understood that this Government has been several times in danger of being involved in a war with a foreign country to protect this corporation that has a complete monopoly of killing seals in the Bering Sea?

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Yes, sir.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. And what we are asked now to do is to protect this monopoly that will not even pay the Government for the privilege of the monopoly.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Yes, sir; we are asked now to pass this bill to protect a monopoly that has control of the Bering Sea and of the Pribilof Islands. The contract would be profitable to us if this company would pay what they agreed to pay; but they refuse to do so. They have not paid a cent for five years. Then there is another monopoly, located in London, engaged in manufacturing, tanning, and dressing these skins. Two thousand or 3,000 (50,000 according to Mr. DINGLEY'S report in 1896) Englishmen in London are making their living out of this industry. There are not more than 300 American citizens making their living out of it. There are two monopolies that we are asked to protect; and we are asked to create another monopoly or, at least, to give a quitclaim deed of our right to participate in the lawful pursuit of these seals upon the high seas.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. Then the conclusion seems to be this, that the money spent and the efforts made by this Government in reference to this matter have been merely for the protection of this monopoly, not for the protection of the rights of American people.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Since 1890 that has been the effect. No matter what may have been the intention, that has been the effect.

Some gentlemen who think we are living under the same conditions that existed before 1893 believe it is possible to restore the seal herd. At that time no man knew where the herd was from November, when it disappeared from the Aleutian Islands, until it showed up on the coast of San Francisco. Now the location of the herd is well known. The English commissioners published a chart showing where that seal herd was every day of the year, and Prof. Starr Jordan, whom we have had the last two summers in the Pribilof Islands, is going still further; he has collected the log books of every schooner engaged in this trade for more than twenty years.

He has submitted a preliminary report to Congress; and he says that in his great, big, regular, full, and complete report he will give a chart showing not only the general route of these vessels, but also showing where every seal has been caught in recent years. We are going to this enormous expense to get this information for the sealers in order to show them just where to make their hunts successfully; and then we will make it a criminal offense for our people to engage in that hunt, while we are spending thousands of dollars in pointing out to others where in the trackless Bering Sea and Pacific Ocean they can find this herd every day all winter.

Mr. LENTZ. If we do not protect the seals, how are we going to protect the seal experts in their next junketing expedition?

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. I had not intended to say much on that subject, but since information has been called for as to these seal experts, I will send to the Clerk's desk to be read an article which I think will answer the gentleman's question.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Cleveland Recorder, August 9, 1897.]

THE SEAL EXPERTS—SOME OF THE QUEER PERFORMANCES OF TREASURY DEPARTMENT—MEN WHO NEVER SAW A SEAL SENT UP TO THE BERING SEA TO REPORT ON FACTS—ONE OF THE REASONS WHY THE AMERICAN CASE HAS BEEN SO BADLY MANGLED.

WASHINGTON, August 8, 1897.

So this "seal conference" which is to be held in Washington next October is to be a mere war of words between Canadian, English, American, Russian, and Japanese naturalists or "experts." These "experts" have been together several times prior to this date, and every time that they take a hand in the fur-seal business it is just so much the worse for the unhappy seals.

The American "experts" who have been liberally advertised in this controversy are a queer lot, with one or two exceptions. They have all been started up to the islands as fur seal "experts," when, in fact, not one of them had ever seen a fur seal in his life before he landed on the seal or breeding grounds. This jumble of inexperienced men and naturalists since 1890 has hurt the cause of the fur seal far more than it has helped; in short, a review of these men and their work reflects no credit on the Administrations sending them up, and it will serve to explain how it is a comparatively easy matter for Canada to keep the upper hand, even with the admitted fact in London that the American complaint is just.

When Elliott finished his work of investigation, which was specially ordered by Congress, he forced his modus vivendi of 1891-1893 into effect. It stopped Steve Elkins and his butchers on the islands, and it stopped the Canadian butchers in the waters of Bering Sea. It also made Elliott a persona non grata to Elkins and the Canadians, especially Elkins, and so an "expert" who had not even the remotest idea of a fur seal was chosen to "complete" Elliott's work.

This "expert," J. Stanley Brown, figures in the proceedings of the Bering Sea tribunal as the "expert" for the case of the United States, and his ripe knowledge and mature judgment is gravely quoted at length all through the proceedings by old John W. Foster, who managed this scandalous affair for us. Associated with Brown in this advance movement of "experts" in 1891 was one W. H. Williams, a revenue agent of the Treasury Department, who also knew nothing of a fur seal until he landed. He was a large, fleshy man; sprained his leg as soon as he got ashore, and then listened in the office to field reports for all that he knew or knows to-day of the seals. This valuable adviser went over to Paris with Brown as an "expert" also, and he, too, is freely quoted by our counsel.

These two men were the only "experts" taken over to Paris by the able John W. Foster, and they enabled Foster to appear quite as well informed as themselves. The result, however, was unfortunate for the American case.

Then, following the selection of "Experts" Brown and Williams, came the appointment of Merriam, a clerk in the Agricultural Department, and Mendenhall, Superintendent of the United States Coast Survey, as commissioners to meet a brace of British commissioners of the islands.

Neither of these men had ever seen a fur seal in their lives, nor did they pretend to ever know anything of the subject. That was enough. They had mastered the question in all its details, and were going to wipe up the earth with the Englishmen.

But when the British commissioners, Dawson and Baden Powell, were shut up with Merriam and Mendenhall for a few weeks, that "wiping up" did not occur. On the contrary, the other fellows took the cake and left for Ottawa in rare good humor.

After old John W. Foster and these "experts" got used up at Paris before the Bering Sea tribunal, the American people had a rest on the score of seal sharps until Charles S. Hamlin suddenly became an "expert"—he had made a visit in 1894 to the seal islands and "investigated" the situation there all of three long days. Down he comes, and since then, to this hour, he is regarded seriously by the officialism of the Treasury Department as a good "expert" on seal life.

Hamlin did not want a monopoly, however, of this "expert" business. So in 1895 he sent up a little commission of two more naturalists, Messrs. Stejneger and True, to investigate and share the honors with him. Stejneger went over to the Russian islands, while True gave himself up to ours.

True determined to have no nonsense as to what was a correct census of the seals. He made one. He fixed the returns so that when the season of 1895 ended there were only 154,000 fur seals of all ages left alive on the islands. True got all of the lesser Treasury agents to agree with him and Stejneger to declare that True's count was the only correct one ever made on the islands.

Hamlin got no recognition from John Bull, in spite of several fervid seal letters written on the strength of these expert investigations, so in 1896 he sent Jordan, the Leland Stanford University man, up at the head of another set of "experts," all of whom abjectly followed Jordan, who himself never saw the seal grounds before.

Jordan's work played the deuce with the work of Hamlin's 1895 commission; he found that there were five times as many seals on the islands, and made several other embarrassing discoveries which the Canadians were delighted to have him make.

Canada, fearful of losing her grip on the subject, would not let a joint commission go up in 1896. She permitted two Englishmen and one of her own scouts to meet Jordan on the islands and investigate informally. The Britishers buncoed Jordan, and actually have got him in cold type as predicting a perfect agreement between themselves and the Americans as to the suspension of pelagic sealing, etc.

Now Jordan is cooling off his chagrin upon the seal islands, having just had time to tell a reporter, as he left Seattle last month, that the "shirt-sleeve" letter of John W. Foster was a good one. He knew it was good, because it had been submitted to him before it was sent to Salisbury.

"Experts" like the foregoing are to meet the British agents of similar "rank and smell" next October to talk over the natural-history incidents as they appear to them that relate to the life of the fur seal. They are not permitted to consider the vital question—the scheme of revised regulations for saving those unhappy animals from the slaughter that is now decimating the race. Add to their number a Russian "expert" or two, and possibly a Jap.

What arrant stuff and nonsense all this confabulation is—what a shame and imposition on the public Treasury, and what a foot mat we are for the Canadians on this question!

Will these men ever agree upon the natural history of the fur seal? Not a bit of it. No five or six naturalists ever got together yet and did so. They are precisely as so many lawyers and doctors, who never fail to disagree if they get a chance.

The Canadians took a firm grip on the fur-seal business when they cleaned old John W. Foster out at Paris in 1893. They have the same grip to-day and the same old Foster. They are laughing at the American people, and well they may.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Now, sir, we shall lack very much of doing our whole duty if we turn over the policy of our Government to a set of experts like that.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. One question for information: Is this John W. Foster whom you have been "lambasting" and who is flippantly referred to in the paper just read as "old John W. Foster"—is he the venerable gentleman who was Secretary of State at the close of Harrison's Administration?

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Well, I am not prepared to admit that I have been "lambasting" anybody; but I will say this, the question put by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LENTZ] called for some explanation as to these seal experts, and as I had this article at hand I thought it proper to send it up to be read. Let me say that I do not myself indorse that disrespectful term "old." We shall all of us be "old" some time if we behave ourselves and live long enough. Hence I do not approve that part of the article. But this is the same John W. Foster who was in Mr. Harrison's Cabinet as Secretary of State, filling out the unexpired term after the death of Mr. Blaine.

I think I have made clear, Mr. Chairman, that for the last seven years we have made no money out of this thing. How many years do you suppose it will be before we shall make any money out of it for the Treasury?

Mr. FARIS. I should like to ask this question for information: Is it true, as has been suggested in certain quarters, that the son of the Secretary of the Treasury is in a position up in the Northwest where he is interested in this business which the gentleman has been discussing? I ask this because of the suggestion of the gentleman in beginning his speech to-day that there are certain favorites in this business—that certain favoritism has been shown.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. I am not prepared to state who these different beneficiaries would be if this bill should become a law; but of course you know, as I know, that a son of the Secretary of the Treasury is a high official in one of the great transportation companies now in the Alaska region. What connection he expects to have, or may have, with this great monopoly I do not pretend to know and do not care to say.

Mr. FARIS. But you do not know that he has any?

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. No; but I know that the men who are now "globe-trotting" at our expense, on a salary of $5,000 a year, and all of the expenses that they may choose to run up, are likely to profit by the bill if you but yield and create a police force for patrolling the Pacific Ocean, and allow even a midshipman, or a lieutenant in the Navy, to arrest and stop ships on the high seas. If that is done, there is no telling what expense we shall be called upon to provide for hereafter.

If we pass the bill, that will make it criminal for our men on any of our ships to carry even a shotgun or a spear in a vessel. You leave it possible that some lieutenant in the Navy may believe, or profess to believe, that the intention of the owner of the vessel was to use the shotgun or the spear in pelagic sealing, and you thereby enable him to stop the ship and arrest the crew.

Mr. FARIS. Is the bill against which the gentleman argues now recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Oh, yes. But, Mr. Speaker, I do think that the House of Representatives should not be entirely guided by a letter from the Secretary of any one of the Departments, or letters from experts or anyone else outside. We have a duty to perform to investigate these matters for ourselves and cast intelligent and conscientious votes upon them.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, with his consent.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I would like to ask the gentleman why the sealing company has not paid what the gentleman says it agreed to pay to the Government, and what steps have been taken to collect the amount?

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. They made the contract in competition with the Alaska Commercial Company, in 1890, with the expectation and hope that things were to continue for the next twenty years as they had during the preceding twenty; and they could well afford, under those circumstances, to pay the $60,000 a year rent and $10.25 apiece for each seal skin taken, if the British Government had not published the charts which enabled the pelagic sealers to follow the seal herd all winter and destroy it on the high seas.

But, in answer to the gentleman, I will state that the excuse they make now is that they did not catch as many seals as they expected to catch; in other words, that they did not make as much money as they expected to make when they entered into the contract.

Mr. DOLLIVER. But the gentleman says that they have not paid anything.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. No; they have not paid anything since 1892—not a single nickel.

Mr. HITT. If the gentleman will permit me, there is a question pending where two different and divergent opinions of Attorneys-General have been given. A prohibition was made against the taking of any beyond a certain fixed number of seals; and the company has claimed that it is willing to pay the proportionate part of the amount agreed upon for the number of seals it was allowed to take. In one case, when this matter was under consideration by the Attorney-General, provision was made for an abatement of the rent and bonus to be paid by this company. But another Attorney-General dissents from that opinion. In order to settle the matter a suit has been brought, which is now pending. But this company has made tender of a proportionate part of the amount of the rent and bonus, under what they claim is a proper construction of the contract.

A MEMBER. Where is that suit pending?

Mr. HITT. Here in New York.

Mr. HOPKINS. I would like to ask the gentleman from North Dakota if it is a fact that the opinion of the late Democratic Secretary was called to the subject and he declined to authorize a suit against the company?

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. There is no question as to that. I do not care to go into that subject. It is not necessary in connection with the branch of the question that I have been discussing.

Mr. HOPKINS. These arrearages occurred during the late Democratic Administration, did they not?

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Certainly; commencing in 1893.

Mr. HOPKINS. While Mr. Carlisle was Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Yes; in three or four years of the Democratic Administration.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why does not the present Secretary of the Treasury institute a suit? He has been in now for ten months.

Mr. HITT. These lessees are perfectly responsible and are under bond.

Mr. STEELE. I should like to ask the gentleman from North Dakota if he has any idea at all that the Secretary of the Treasury was influenced by the fact that he has a son in business on the Pacific Coast?

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Oh, I do not insinuate that. I have no information on that subject.

Mr. STEELE. I wanted you to say that, because I did not think you intended to convey any such impression.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Certainly. I am glad to have an opportunity to say this. I thank the House for its attention. [Applause.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HITT. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. HEPBURN. I want to be recognized in my own right. I am in opposition to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to follow the line of discussion of the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON], but I do believe that at all times during the existence of this contention between the United States and Canada we have had it in our power to compel an adjustment of this matter with the Canadian Government. I understand this is a controversy with Canada rather than with Great Britain, and that the Government of Great Britain has been willing, and was willing long ago, to come to a satisfactory adjustment of it with the United States, save through the interference and opposition of the Government of the Dominion of Canada.

Yet I have thought that during all of this period we have had it in our power, at any time that we desired to exercise the power we have, to compel an adjustment of this matter with the Canadian Government. Here is an interest that they are trying to protect, and I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] will agree with me it is certainly not worth more to them than a quarter of a million of dollars annually, even if it is worth so much. Yet there is another interest that Canada has in the manner in which we conduct our business, a business over which we have absolute control when we see fit to exercise it, and yet which we give to them a large participation in, which is worth ten or twenty times as much to them as is this meager matter of pelagic sealing. I wish to send to the Clerk's desk and have the Clerk read section 3006 of the Revised Statutes.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3006. Imported merchandise in bond, or duty paid, and products or manufactures of the United States, may, with the consent of the proper authorities of the British provinces or Republic of Mexico, be transported from one port in the United States to another port therein, over the territory of such provinces or Republic, by such routes, and under such rules, regulations, and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and the merchandise so transported shall, upon arrival in the United States from such provinces or Republic, be treated in regard to the liability to or exemption from duty, or tax, as if the transportation had taken place entirely within the limits of the United States.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, under the authority of that section of the statute there has been permitted a large participation by Canadian railways in the traffic of the United States. Under that section the railroads of the United States at the frontiers deliver to Canadian railways, to be carried through Canadian territory and again to be delivered to American railways, a very large amount of freight. In 1896 it amounted to nearly 600,000 loaded cars, or nearly 6,000,000 tons of freight, every pound of which might have been carried on an American road, and if the American roads had had that traffic they could have been carried at the same low rates that were obtained by giving the Canadian roads participation. There is an interest that we are giving without return to Canadian roads and to Canadian capital, amounting to anywhere between six million and fifteen million dollars every year.

We could repeal that section, or the Secretary of the Treasury, by unfriendly regulations, could make that undesirable to Canadian roads, in the interest of American roads and American stockholders and American laborers. Year after year, in Administrations Democratic and Republican, I know that this has been a matter of discussion. I know that Secretary Windom had arrived at the conclusion that it was his duty to stop this traffic, and in the last conversation I ever had with him in my life, and within a few hours of his death, he told me he had arrived at the determination that it was not desirable or in the interest of the United States to longer continue it.

Now, when these negotiations were going on, and when the Canadians were insisting that they were unwilling to sell a great right that they had, and yet were willing to trade this great right for certain advantages which would come to them through a modification of our tariff, I have never read that Commissioner Foster suggested for a moment that this interest of Canadians might be put in jeopardy, or that he used it in any way as a leverage of any kind to bring to a successful conclusion the negotiations which were pending. I believe that it is the opinion of the honorable gentleman who introduced this bill [Mr. HITT] that we might rightfully exercise our powers in this matter and bring this contention to a conclusion almost within the limits of the present year. I do not know why it has not been done. I can imagine that there are in one section of the country slight conflicting interests, perhaps large to them, but not large to them in comparison with the great interest of the whole people of this country.

Why, Mr. Speaker, we refuse to allow an English or a Canadian vessel to participate in the slightest degree in our coastwise trade. They can not carry a pound of freight from one American port to another American port under any foreign flag; and yet see how we permit them to participate in our coastwise trade under this section. If a car starts loaded with freight from Boston, it is delivered at the Canadian frontier, within 200 miles. Then it is carried 3,000 miles on the Canadian Pacific Railroad. Then it is delivered to a nominally American ship, flying the American flag, but owned by English capitalists, and it is transported to San Francisco. It is coastwise trade. They have 4,000 miles of it, we 200, under the provisions of this section. If this traffic that has been diverted from our roads were given to them—and there is an American road to perform every service that is performed by the Canadian road, if it were given to our roads—then there can be no question but with that added traffic they could transport the merchandise as cheaply as it is done under the present arrangement.

Mr. KNOWLES. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KNOWLES. Did not the last session of Congress pass an act discriminating against the Canadian Pacific Railway by imposing an additional duty of 10 per cent upon goods entering this country over that road?

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not care to enter into a discussion of that matter.

Mr. KNOWLES. What has become of that?

Mr. HEPBURN. I think the gentleman's information is quite equal to any I have upon that subject. But I am trying to discuss this dispassionately, without trying to make this or that party responsible for failure in the matter. I am trying to point out to this country the fact that we have the power to terminate this long-drawn-out international disagreement if we only mean to get at it in the proper way.

But while I am discussing this I want to indulge one further thought, and that is this, that under the present regulation, and of that class of regulations that we have always had, there is and there can be no safety to the customs revenues of the United States. Here is a car loaded with merchandise to be shipped from one point of the United States, through Canadian territory, to another. What is the protection while it is on foreign soil? Simply the protection of a seal, costing from 4 to 5 cents, that anybody could imitate, that anybody can take off and put on again. It passes the frontier without inspection. It is on foreign soil without the safety of the custodianship of an American officer. It comes back to the frontier again without further inspection than for a Treasury agent to pass along the side of the train and see if the seal is intact.

It is delivered to the railway, the American carrier, and he in turn delivers it over to the consignee, without the intervention of a customs officer in its passage out, in its passage in, or in its delivery. Who dares to say that there is not a substitution of dutiable goods on Canadian soil in lieu of those undutiable goods? I have put that question to Treasury officials over and over again, and every time the answer has been, "There is no one who knows and no one can know." If you go to the necessary expense so that the Government may be entirely safe, the traffic is no longer desirable. If there is an inspection at the outgoing frontier and then at the incoming, and during the time it is on foreign soil, having the eye of an inspector of the Department over it, these expenses to be borne by the beneficiary railroad, this traffic is undesirable; and something of that kind, in my judgment, is absolutely essential in order to protect the revenues.

Why, the Treasury officials in this Administration and in the last one have said to me that they do not know of any infraction of the revenue laws. No; they can not know it. It is utterly impossible that they should know it; and there is no endeavor to try to find out. The car, you remember, is received by the railroad company, not by a customs officer. It is delivered to the consignee by the railroad company, not by a customs-house officer.

Now, I think, Mr. Speaker, that if my friend is sincere, as I know he is—his purposes are all straightforward—now that I have called his attention to this means of coercion—perhaps that is not the word I should use in that connection—this means of persuasion—that is the better one—to be applied to the Canadian Government, if we would place a provision in this bill requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to suspend the operations of section 3006 until there is a successful solution of the seal question, it will be done before the next vacation of this body. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, agreeing with much that the honorable gentleman from Iowa has said in regard to the legislation he proposes, I would be unwilling to hazard the permanency of so excellent a measure by making it a mere condition of another measure. [Laughter.] I have expressed my views on that great question heretofore. We are now occupied with one to which alone this bill relates.

The gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] desires some time, and I yield to him five minutes.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, it is with great diffidence that I should ever venture to question the wisdom of any measure that so great a diplomat as the gentleman from Illinois brings before this House, especially a measure concerning our diplomatic relations, but it seems to me he is seeking in this case to deal with a question that goes away beyond our diplomatic relations. He is seeking to inflict a penalty upon American citizens engaged in what is to-day a legitimate trade for them, and what after to-day, even if this bill should become a law, would still be a legitimate trade for the citizens of Great Britain. Now, while I object to any legislation of this kind and quite agree with the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON], that there is more sentiment than sense in this seal question, which has cost this Government and must continue to cost it millions of dollars almost annually, still if there was any necessity for this proposed law, I should not seriously object to its passage.

But, Mr. Speaker, we are now, I believe, endeavoring to negotiate a treaty with Great Britain to cover this very subject; and why can not this question be left to be determined by that treaty? If Great Britain proposes to prohibit her citizens from engaging in pelagic sealing, then, at the same time, at the same hour, by that treaty our own citizens will be denied the privilege. Why, therefore, I ask the gentleman, in all sincerity, should he come here and seek to bind the hands of American citizens when, if it is desirable to bind them at all in this matter (which I do not concede), it can be done under the treaty? Why can not we wait for the adoption of that treaty? It seems to me that that is the wiser course.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I oppose, especially at this time, this legislation. Great Britain never will consent to surrender any supremacy at sea or any supremacy of trade that she now has. Step by step you have driven this business out of the hands of Americans, until they have been compelled to put their vessels under the English flag; for, while most of the vessels engaged in the business for many years have been under the British flag, the nominal owners have been citizens of the United States. My God, is it necessary for Congress year after year to inaugurate and pass legislation which will finally drive from the seas every vestige of commerce that we have? I ask you to consider this question deliberately. It is one that reaches far beyond the questions which usually come to us from the Committee on Foreign Affairs. It reaches far beyond all diplomatic considerations. It is a question involving the rights of American citizens and the rights of American commerce.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, in replying to what has been said, I will confine myself to the bill and to the substantial results sought to be attained by it, for this is a measure which is intended to aid in preserving and protecting a great interest of the Government, and also interests of citizens of the United States that are believed to be involved ultimately. The Government is the absolute sovereign owner of every seal on the Pribilof Islands. We receive for every seal skin lawfully taken on the islands by the lessees of the Government, under the present terms of the lease, $12.62½. That is, they pay $7.62½ bonus per seal skin for the exclusive privilege of taking them, and $2 additional of internal revenue on every skin.

Then there is the $60,000 of rent which we receive if the company gets the full catch. In that case they have to pay that lump sum as rent. At present this is held up by a lawsuit because the lessees, not having been allowed to take as many seals as the contract contemplated, have claimed that while they should pay the bonus per head, they ought not to be compelled to pay so great a lump sum as rent when the catch allowed was so small. To illustrate, in 1892 they were permitted to take only some 7,500 seals, instead of a hundred thousand, which they said the lease had contemplated.

This seal herd has been a source of large revenue to the Government. It was and still is a very valuable property. We received between 1870 and 1890, in direct payment from the lessee company that formerly had the lease of the islands, $6,200,000; and then in duties from the importation of skins $5,000,000 more. All of that went into the Treasury of the United States. This $11,000,000 and more was received before pelagic sealing began to diminish the herd so much; and it is with the view of stopping the open-sea destruction of the seals that the pending negotiation is carried on. The cost of the policing of Bering Sea has been greatly exaggerated. The cruisers and cutters have cost in the series of years near a million and a half dollars; but all of them, with their crews, their consumption of coal, and expense of wages, would have been paid if there had not been a seal in existence, for we would have maintained them somewhere.

The number of seals that are in existence now appears not to be generally known, at least not accurately, judging from some of the statements that have been made here. There has been a great diminution in the number, but it is by no means contemptible even now. I have here the last word upon this subject, in the nature of an authoritative estimate for 1896. From this it appears that there were on the two seal islands, at one time or another last year, 143,071 breeding females; of pups born, the same number, 143,071; bulls, 13,005; 4-year-old males, 10,000; 3-year-old males, 15,000 to 20,000; 3-year-old females, 15,000 to 20,000; 2-year-olds, 40,000 to 60,000; yearlings, 50,000 to 70,000; total, 429,147 to 479,147. The depletions by death from natural causes, 11,207; pups, from starvation, 16,019; quota of bachelor seals of killable age, 3 years, under the lease, 30,000; pelagic catch, 29,398; total died on or about the islands, season of 1896, 86,624, leaving alive October 15, 342,523 to 392,523.

The seals come and go during the summer, their breeding season, when they all, every one, go to these two islands; but that was the number on our islands, according to the best computation that could be made, and far the best yet made. It will be found in the preliminary report recently made by the commission—President Jordan, Commander Moser, and Commissioner Townsend. It is a very valuable property, though only a fraction of its number twenty years ago—less than one-fifth. It can, if properly protected, be restored so as to yield the Government the revenue from 100,000 skins annually instead of 30,000. They are polygamous animals, each male capable of holding a place on the breeding grounds, called generally a "harem," having an average number of 30 cows. The other males, called bachelors, are excluded, go apart, and at 3 years of age are called "killable," and each skin should yield the Treasury over $12. Their being killed at 3 years of age does not impair the herd at all. No female is, by law, ever killed. Every female bears one pup every year. We are trying, by negotiation with England, to protect them from Canadian poachers on the high seas, and the negotiation now begins, for the reasons I have stated, to promise success.

Now, because we are losing at present nearly 30,000 seals annually by this pelagic, unneighborly sealing, the remedy proposed by the gentleman who has just spoken, who opposes this bill and opposes all negotiation, is to turn in and kill all of our property there—old and young, females, pups, all those of killable age and valuable, and those now of no value. That was his proposition—to destroy all the seals there.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. I beg the gentleman's pardon——

Mr. HITT. The gentleman began his speech by advocating that method of dealing with our seal property.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. I do not think so.

Mr. HITT. You stated that you proposed the extinction of the herd.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Well, I have no proposition of that kind before the House.

Mr. HITT. You made that proposition here just now.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. This House, both in the last Congress and in the preceding one, passed a bill of that kind.

Mr. HITT. And now you have again put yourself in favor of that proposition. You objected to this bill because it did not follow that policy. The question arising in every legislator's mind is, If this bill does not propose a proper method, what other course shall be pursued? The gentleman stated as his remedy the destruction or extinction of the herd; and, as I understand, he has just repeated that avowal. He would destroy the females, small animals, one-sixth the size of the males, and with skins of little value, and these yearlings, and the pups—these little creatures—by tens of thousands and fifty thousands.

Is that a dignified business, a humane business, for a great Government like this? Why, sir, we have been charging upon the people of other countries that the barbarity in the destruction of the seals lay largely in the destruction of the females, whereby the pups were starved to death. And those islands, summer after summer, have been covered with a long moan, the wailing of scores of thousands of tiny pups, as they perished by slow starvation, because their mothers, going out to sea for food, had been speared by Canadian pelagic hunters. There are a few Americans thus engaged—not many. But we are trying now to obtain the assent of one government, in addition to those that have already assented, to an arrangement to stop this thing. Is not that a more sensible, humane, and reasonable plan?

The interest in favor of the continuance of the pelagic sealing is much less than it used to be; the profit is much less. In our negotiations we have been met constantly with the very reasonable remark on the part of the British negotiator: "Are you sincere when by your laws it is lawful and proper to do the thing which you ask us not to do and which you call unneighborly, barbarous, and contrary to the interest of mankind?" In that position of affairs Congress is asked by the two Departments to take this matter up.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. The gentleman speaks as if the death of the pup is caused altogether or almost entirely by the starvation of the mother.

Mr. HITT. No, sir; not at all. The report which we have separates distinctly these two things—the killing of the pups by starvation consequent upon the inhuman destruction of the mother, 16,019 in 1896, and the killing of the pup by crowding, straying, etc., 11,045. The little pup, weighing only about 8 pounds, is of no great value at that age, while the bull of 3 or 4 years, which gives the valuable skin, weighs 400 to 500 pounds. The destruction of the mother causes the slow and painful death of the pup. Why slaughter them uselessly, barbarously?

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Were not over 10,000 of those pups killed last year by the crowding of the bulls on the breeding ground?

Mr. HITT. There is always a proportion of pups lost by natural causes. The destruction by the authority of the Government of 30,000 of these animals, mature and killable bachelors, must not be understood as having anything to do with the diminution of the herd. The removal of the 3-year-old bachelor male does not tend in the least to diminish or destroy the continuity of the herd as a race; on the contrary, it diminishes the loss of pups by crowding and smothering. Remember, the seals are a polygamous race, and there being a great number of surplus males, "bachelors," the removal of those of maturity is rather beneficial than otherwise, as it avoids the crowding of the pups of which the gentleman has spoken. The proposition which the gentleman defended a while ago was the destruction of these poor creatures, these little animals, a proceeding which he regarded as not barbarous.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. That question is not before the House now.

Mr. HITT. The gentleman said, as I understood, that this destruction of these animals had no element of barbarity or inhumanity in it.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. I carefully left out that question. The only thing I wanted to accomplish was to defeat this bill.

Mr. HITT. The gentleman expressly said there was nothing more barbarous in it than in ordinary butchering of animals. The State of Maine has a law making it unlawful to kill a cow moose. The moose being polygamous, the same reasons apply as in the case of the fur seal. In Nova Scotia, also, it is a felony to kill a cow moose.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. There is no proposition before the House to kill these seal on the island.

Mr. HITT. That is practically the alternative which is presented by him in opposition to this bill. One thing or the other should be done. On the one hand the proposition of the bill is, save the seal if you can. That is the proposition apparently of common sense. That is what all of our statesmen charged with this great valuable property have been trying to do for years in the face of great obstacles. Now we are undertaking to accomplish that object with some hope of success by a negotiation, Japan and Russia concurring with us. Of course, I do not know whether the effort will be successful. I am not a prophet.

But the conditions are far more favorable for success than formerly. Canada has lost part of her zeal on the other side, because she has lost a great part of the profit formerly derived from that source. On the 27th of last month an agreed statement of facts was signed by the British and American delegates, showing that the profit at present is becoming very slight both for our lessees and for the pelagic sealers. When there is no interest left to oppose us, there will be no opposition.

What we want is a regulation, a determination of the question between the nations, by which the seal life may be preserved not only on the islands, where they are protected as our property, but on the high seas, where we claim that they ought to be protected, as well as on the islands.

Mr. PLOWMAN. What assurance have you to offer to the House that the English Government will join in the action proposed upon this question?

Mr. HITT. That is the very question that is pending and which the bill before the House is intended to aid in solving to our interest. We are endeavoring to secure just such an agreement. But they say, "If you believe what you profess as to this evil practice, why do you not prevent your own citizens from doing the wrong of which you complain?"

Mr. GAINES. How long has the proposition been pending?

Mr. HITT. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. GAINES. How long have the present propositions been pending?

Mr. HITT. The contention has taken various forms through years past. Mr. Bayard had it before him, and it was thought to be arranged. It went to the Tribunal of Arbitration afterwards, and they discussed it under another form, as to jurisdiction and the rules necessary, etc., to be adopted to preserve the seals. But the gentleman, I am sure, does not want me to go into that history. It is well known.

The present question is in such form that some good may result from it, because the negotiators on both sides are to be presumed to be reasonable men, satisfied with a reasonable condition of affairs.

A MEMBER. You say that Russia and Japan have consented?

Mr. HITT. Russia and Japan have consented, and have signified their assent.

Mr. CANNON. Will my friend allow me a moment?

Mr. HITT. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. I have been out most of the time during the discussion of this question, and desire, therefore, to understand the bill, as it is pending for passage at this time. If the bill passes, as I understand it, the United States citizen can not enter into the business of pelagic sealing in the Bering Sea; and, also, I understand the gentleman to say that Russia and Japan have already retired from the business. Am I correct?

Mr. HITT. They have expressed a desire to make a convention to stop the business of pelagic sealing.

Mr. CANNON. Further, then, Great Britain does not propose to enter into any such agreement, as I understand it; but she says, "We will not make any legislation upon the subject so far as we are concerned, but will require you to show that you are in earnest in what you say, and to suggest that we exhibit our fidelity in the premises by legislation upon the subject, and say, 'If you do not legislate, we will say that you are not in earnest in your proposed agreement.'"

Now, if we legislate, and British subjects still engage in the business of pelagic sealing, after a year or two, if we do not cure the evil of which the gentleman speaks, I suppose he will come and ask to have the legislation repealed?

Mr. HITT. It is not likely that there will be any interest coming to ask for the repeal of this law. The American pelagic sealing interest is rather an imaginary one than otherwise. But our representatives at these conferences have to answer at all times the fact that some American citizens were guilty of poaching and we permit it, or do not prohibit it, while asking other governments to do so.

The English negotiators, when we ask concurrence upon this question, tell us that we wish to drive them from the field, as acting in an unneighborly manner; but do we believe what we claim, when we do not prohibit this practice on the part of our own citizens? It was in the old law; it was in the law that existed prior to the Paris Tribunal of Arbitration. Their award annulled it, and we have not renewed it.

Mr. CANNON. Would it not be a good answer to them to say that they are simply begging the question when they propose that we shall put this into our law; and are suggesting something for us to do that they do not propose to do?

Mr. HITT. They do not propose that we should do it. They contend that it is perfectly proper, under the conditions existing, that it should be done. But they can question our consistency when we say it is improper and yet do not prevent it where we have the power. But they do not ask us to pass such a law, nor do they ask us to do anything. We are the party proposing action.

Mr. CANNON. We are here then asked to pass a law to bolster up some agents——

Mr. HITT (interrupting). The Secretary of State.

Mr. CANNON (continuing). Who are trying to make a treaty. It seems to me that Great Britain, through her diplomatic agents, is paltering with the question. [Applause.]

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield to me for a question?

Mr. HITT. Certainly.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I think you referred to the starving and wailing "pups" which are being destroyed upon these islands?

Mr. HITT. I said that the pups perish when the mothers are killed.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I believe you have a resolution in your hands from the Foreign Affairs Committee where we have asked some relief for the wailing and starving citizens of Cuba. Do you propose to give them the same treatment we give to the seal pups on these islands? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HITT. Well, we have been unable to do anything for the pups, but are endeavoring here to preserve all the seals. The cases are not analogous. There is a negotiation in both cases. I do not think the gentleman asked the question for an answer. [Laughter.]

Mr. LENTZ. I understood the gentleman to say that we had this provision in a former law. At that time did it encourage any of these British subjects to respect the law?

Mr. HITT. Oh, yes; they obeyed it, at least in degree. They had to, for our cruisers were after them. That was what brought on the contention, which was referred to arbitration. They partly obeyed the law and partly resisted. Our cruisers captured them, the case came up from the courts, came into diplomatic discussion, and finally went to arbitration before the Paris Tribunal. Its decision was against us on our jurisdiction over the high seas; but they framed rules to prevent pelagic sealing, which proved a failure. That is the occasion of the whole controversy now.

Mr. LENTZ. Did the Canadians, who are now, as I understand it, killing the same seal herd, retire at that time from the sea?

Mr. HITT. No further than they were forced to. The only thing that can compel a Canadian to retire is the mandate of the Government to which he owes obedience, the authority of British law, or an agreement between nations, Great Britain included, which is the same thing, or, lastly, a cessation of interest or profits, when he will stop because it does not pay. As soon as interest or profit ceases, of course all men will cease.

Mr. GREENE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HITT. Certainly.

Mr. GREENE. I understood you to say that the Government of Great Britain did not ask us to pass this law, but that they thought pelagic sealing was right. Am I correct in that?

Mr. HITT. That is their contention.

Mr. GREENE. Now, if we pass this law and shut off Americans, have we the slightest hope that they will stop their subjects from pelagic sealing if they believe it is right?

Mr. HITT. This is not a question of conscience or moral right and wrong in the sense in which the gentleman refers to it. They contend that it is their right by international law under the decision of the Paris Tribunal. We have tried to stigmatize it as barbarous, and they answer our allegation that it is unneighborly and barbarous by suggesting that we can hardly be very sincere in that when we let our own citizens pursue it as an ordinary vocation.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I should like to inquire, in the event of the passage of this law, could not the vessels now engaged in the sealing industry under the American flag register under the protection of the British flag and continue operations?

Mr. HITT. It is very possible that the individuals whose money is invested would have some of it put under the British flag.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Then——

Mr. HITT. Let me read what Secretary Sherman says about that:

> Since the regulations of that tribunal have been in force a comparatively small number of American vessels have engaged in killing seals at sea, but there is evidence to believe that a considerable American interest has been invested in the sealing vessels which sail from Canadian ports under the British flag.

I might confirm that by saying that when we had before us three years ago the sum agreed upon by our Secretary of State and the British minister, $425,000, to be paid by us for damages incurred by Canadian sealers arrested by our cruisers, the House on investigation discovered that three-fourths of it went, in fact, to American citizens who had been violating our own laws, while covering themselves with the British flag.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Is it not absolutely certain that if this industry is profitable, and American vessels are now engaged in it, if we compel them to take down the American flag, will they not, for the sake of following this profitable industry, take another flag and still continue in the business?

Mr. HITT. I will say that I think if the interest was very profitable there would be a tendency that way; but I have tried to make it plain that pelagic sealing itself is languishing, and as the commissioners state in the joint agreement here, it is reaching what they call the equilibrium, where the seal ceases to have commercial value either to the lessees or to the pelagic sealers.

This languishing condition, this diminished interest, this disappearing profit of pelagic sealing, is the condition of which we are trying to take advantage to press upon the English Government the great interest we have, to which they, as a friendly nation, would yield from a desire to have amicable relations. In this way, by negotiation, our Government, with Russia and Japan, is pressing a permanent arrangement to protect this race of useful creatures. If that is secured, then in the near future the seals, having their permanent home on our islands, which permanent home it seems from their nature can not be changed, it is believed that this large industry and wide revenue will be restored.

Mr. GREENE. Will the gentlemen permit me?

Mr. HITT. Yes, certainly.

Mr. GREENE. You have said the British have contended that this is a right they have?

Mr. HITT. That it is their right under international law.

Mr. GREENE. They have contended that this pelagic sealing is a right, and still you insist that if we pass this bill it will enable us to arrive at an agreement. What hope or assurance have you that we can ever make any agreement with the Canadian Government to stop pelagic sealing if we do this?

Mr. HITT. That question involves a great deal. I have the language of the agreement here, which shows the concession Great Britain has made. It was signed recently by the delegates of Great Britain and the United States. I will read one statement now agreed to which has not before been admitted, and is an important part in our contention that all legislators and nations ought to stop pelagic sealing:

> Pelagic sealing involves the killing of males and females alike, without discrimination, and in proportion as the two sexes coexist in the sea. The reduction of males effected on the islands causes an enhanced proportion of females to be found in the pelagic catch; hence this proportion, if it varies from no other cause, varies at least with the catch upon the islands. In 1895 Mr. A. B. Alexander, on behalf of the Government of the United States, found 62.3 per cent of females in the catch of the Dora Sieverd in Bering Sea, and in 1896 Mr. Andrew Halkett, on behalf of the Canadian Government, found 84.2 per cent in the catch of the same schooner in the same sea.
> The polygamous habits of the animal, coupled with an equal birth rate of the two sexes, permits a large number of males to be removed with impunity from the herd, while, as with other animals, any similar abstraction of females checks or lessens the herd's increase, or when carried further brings about an actual diminution of the herd.
> While, from a consideration of the birth rate or from an inspection of the visible effects, it is manifest that the take of females in recent years has been so far in excess of the natural increment as to lead to a reduction of the herd in the degree related above, yet the ratio of the pelagic catch of one year to that of the following has fallen off more rapidly than the ratio of the breeding herd of one year to the breeding herd of the next.

Now, there is a part of the agreed statement of fundamental facts. That is admitting much they have never before conceded. They admit that the killing of female seals was injudicious; that it was an unwise proceeding.

Mr. GREENE. But they do not agree to quit.

Mr. HITT. But the point I am getting at is this: That they have at last admitted facts which are the foundation of an agreement, to a reasonable mind. Able men are more likely to come to an arrangement to stop the useless, mischievous destruction of female seals at sea when they assent to such propositions in the beginning of the negotiation.

Mr. GREENE. Would they continue to kill them?

Mr. HITT. I can not say what they will ultimately agree to. They have made that statement, and they never assented to it before. That is a long stride toward a peaceful settlement. You must come to assent upon some basis or you can never reach an agreement in any treaty or convention.

I will add a word of answer about the Government not having received anything recently from the lessee company. There was a difference of opinion, which is stated very fully by the different Secretaries of the Treasury and Attorneys-General as to the difference of view between the lessee company and the United States as to what amount was due, whether the full rent or less when the yield permitted was less. That matter has gone into litigation. It is there in the courts, and I suppose the interest or claim of the Government is perfectly safe. The company is strong and responsible. It has given abundant security and deposited Government bonds, and therefore there is no danger of the Government not being fully paid. There are legal questions pending whether they should pay $60,000 rent per year, when in some years they were only allowed to take 7,500 instead of 100,000 seals.

Mr. GAINES. How is it that they have not paid anything since 1892?

Mr. HITT. That is the time when the litigation arose. The Government in 1893 forbade them taking 100,000, and only permitted them to take 7,500. They said that the condition of the herd was such that they could have been allowed to take 20,000, but the Government in negotiating with Great Britain, for political reasons had agreed to only allow the 7,500 which were required for the subsistence of the natives.

Mr. DINSMORE. Will my colleague on the committee allow me to ask if it is not true that this company has made a tender to the Government of the amount that they would have to pay in proportion to what they got—the number of seals killed?

Mr. HITT. They have tendered the whole amount of rent due to the Government in proportion to the number that they were allowed to take as compared with the number contemplated in the lease. But the whole case is one of ordinary litigation, all rights being secured.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Do you think it is possible, or did the American commissioners think it was possible, to convince the British Government that it will be to the mutual advantage of the two countries?

Mr. HITT. They hope to do that, and there are a good many reasons why they should think so that I can not go into.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I should like the gentleman to state them to the House.

Mr. HITT. I will give one reason. For example, it has been stated by the gentleman from North Dakota that this question had been linked politically, by Great Britain or Canada, with the tariff, and that the Canadian deputation had tried to use it in order to enable them to prescribe our tariff.

On the contrary, when they were here eager to get the admission of their products into our country by a special arrangement under our tariff provisions or by treaty they did not bring up pelagic sealing, far from it; but our Government did, and that most effectively, saying: "Gentlemen, after you will consent to first stop pelagic sealing, we will then enter upon the discussion you so much desire to open in regard to reciprocity and the admission of your products and the other pending questions between the countries; but until you consent to stop pelagic sealing, we will defer the question."

Then they realized that there might be some disadvantages to Canadians from pelagic sealing as well as the advantages to the Province of British Columbia.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to ask the gentleman a question for information.

Mr. HITT. Certainly.

Mr. SWANSON. Is it a fact that the Canadians can not do any sealing at all except on the ocean? They have no islands or rookeries?

Mr. HITT. No seal islands at all.

Mr. SWANSON. If we were not to permit them to have pelagic sealing, really it amounts to a prohibition of sealing at all, does it not?

Mr. HITT. If we succeed in getting a convention preventing pelagic sealing, they will not be able to catch seals anywhere.

Mr. SWANSON. Nowhere. This is the question I wanted to ask: If the effect of this will not be to prohibit us from sealing, and does the gentleman think that they will consent to it unless we give them concession greater than we get?

Mr. HITT. This does not permit anybody to do anything. It simply prohibits pelagic sealing by all owing obedience to our laws.

Mr. SWANSON. I will ask this question: This prohibits our citizens from sealing, but permits the Canadians to continue sealing?

Mr. HITT. No; it does not permit, it simply provides that all who owe allegiance to our laws shall cease pelagic sealing.

Mr. SWANSON. And the Canadians can continue?

Mr. HITT. We can not make laws for them.

Mr. SWANSON. Then what is to preserve the seals if you pass this bill? How can you preserve the seals unless you can have some treaty with the British Government in reference to Canadian sealers?

Mr. HITT. That is the very purpose of the law—to facilitate the treaty that is now being negotiated. Will the gentleman excuse me if I suggest that I have explained that two or three times?

Mr. SWANSON. I did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. BODINE. As I understand it, this bill looks to a treaty with Great Britain.

Mr. HITT. That is the ultimate purpose.

Mr. BODINE. Now, will that treaty bind any other nation except the United States and Great Britain?

Mr. HITT. Yes; it is expected to be a treaty to which Russia and Japan and the United States agree; so that it will cover all the powers that touch the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. BODINE. Another question for information: Those powers propose to enter into a treaty, but is it proposed that they shall agree to prevent other nations from exercising what the international tribunal has decided to be an international right—the right to kill these seals?

Mr. HITT. They propose to make an international convention which will determine the regulation of seal life upon the high sea. That falls in with the spirit of the determination of the Tribunal of Arbitration and the rules presented by it for the preservation of seal life on the high seas. Those rules proved imperfect and ineffectual, but that was their avowed purpose.

Mr. BODINE. So as to apply to other nations?

Mr. HITT. Of course, the parties to the treaty can not bind other nations, but the other nations will come into it.

Mr. BODINE. What is to prevent them from going on and killing these seals?

Mr. HITT. The other nations are not interested to have discord with us. There is no doubt that they will agree to the treaty. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The question being on ordering the Senate bill to a third reading, Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota asked for the yeas and nays, but withdrew the demand.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 83, noes 30.

So the bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The question being on the passage of the bill, Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota asked for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 148, nays 78; as follows:

YEAS—148.

Adams,	Davis,	Kirkpatrick,	Pierce, Tenn.
Adamson,	Dingley,	Kleberg,	Plowman,
Alexander,	Dinsmore,	Kulp,	Pugh,

So the bill was passed.

The following pairs were announced:

Until further notice:

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH with Mr. SULZER.

Mr. PITNEY with Mr. DOCKERY.

For this day:

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin with Mr. HINRICHSEN.

Mr. WILBER with Mr. WHEELER of Alabama.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE with Mr. VEHSLAGE.

Mr. STEWART of Wisconsin with Mr. RIXEY.

Mr. SHELDEN with Mr. WILSON.

Mr. SHANNON with Mr. ROBB.

Mr. POWERS with Mr. BLAND.

Mr. OVERSTREET with Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama.

Mr. MUDD with Mr. DE ARMOND.

Mr. YOUNG of Pennsylvania with Mr. BENTON.

Mr. MARSH with Mr. YOUNG of Virginia.

Mr. GROW with Mr. UNDERWOOD.

Mr. FOWLER of New Jersey with Mr. JONES of Virginia.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas with Mr. BROUSSARD.

Mr. CORLISS with Mr. BENNER of Pennsylvania.

Mr. CODDING with Mr. ERMENTROUT.

Mr. CLARK of Iowa with Mr. HAY.

Mr. BURLEIGH with Mr. MADDOX.

Mr. BROMWELL with Mr. GRIGGS.

Mr. BENNETT with Mr. SAYERS.

Mr. BABCOCK with Mr. FITZGERALD.

Mr. HENDERSON with Mr. BANKHEAD.

Mr. HEMENWAY with Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana.

Mr. LOVERING with Mr. MARSHALL.

Mr. BELFORD with Mr. LEWIS of Washington.

Mr. MERCER with Mr. SETTLE.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Mr. Speaker, I voted, but as I notice that I am paired, I withdraw my vote.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. HITT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for further consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. HOPKINS in the chair.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. HANDY] has appealed to me to ask consent of the House to recur to the paragraph to which he offered an amendment yesterday, which was ruled out of order by the Chair, an amendment in relation to the opening of the Library at hours other than those which now prevail.

The point of order was made against the amendment that it was contrary to existing law, and the point was sustained. The gentleman from Delaware claims that the ruling was based upon reference to a statute which is not now in operation, and upon that he desires to be heard. I have no objection, and I will yield to the gentleman after making a brief statement.

The ruling of the Chair was based on the old statute providing that the Joint Committee on the Library should determine the rules and regulations covering the Library. The law under which the Library is now operated, which was passed at the close of the last Congress, gives to the Librarian of Congress the authority to make rules and regulations. In fact, however, the rules and regulations that now control the administration of the Library are the rules made by the joint committee, and the point that the gentleman's amendment is contrary to existing law would, therefore, as I understand, still hold good, because the amendment would change the existing law, which allows the Librarian to make rules and regulations. With this statement, I am perfectly willing that we should recur to the paragraph to give the gentleman from Delaware an opportunity to present his view.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is understood, then, that we recur to this provision of the bill in order that it may be acted upon anew.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask consent that it be recurred to, at the request of the gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I hope there will be no objection to recurring to it, but I think the Chair should state the fact that we recur to it by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated that without objection the request would be regarded as granted, and no objection has been made. So that the question is now open for the gentleman from Delaware to present his views.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is satisfactory.

Mr. HANDY. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I offered yesterday was as follows:

For additional expense involved in keeping the Library open daily from 9 a. m. to 10 p. m., $15,000.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania made the point of order that my amendment was inconsistent with existing law; and in support of that point of order he quoted section 85, chapter 3, of the Revised Statutes. The section which he quoted was part of an act of Congress passed in 1802 at the time of the establishment of the Library. That was the law until February 20 of this year. I have not the least doubt that the gentleman, in quoting the statute, fully believed that it was the law at the present time; I did not doubt it; and the Chair made his ruling upon that supposition. I find, however, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania has stated, that the present law governing the case is as follows, being a clause in the last appropriation bill of the same character as the one now under consideration:

For Librarian of Congress, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, $5,000; and the Librarian shall make rules and regulations for the government of the Library of Congress.

The closing paragraph of that act provides that "all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with this act are repealed."

Therefore the authority of the Joint Committee of Congress on the Library to make rules and regulations has been abrogated, and the authority is conferred upon the Librarian in a mandatory clause providing that he "shall make rules and regulations for the government of the Library of Congress."

The CHAIRMAN. That is the existing law now?

Mr. HANDY. That is the existing law; so that it is entirely within the power, and, indeed, it is the duty of the Librarian to revise the rules and regulations under which the Library was placed in the past by the joint committee of Congress. As a matter of fact, the Librarian has not yet exercised that power. He has been framing and drafting his rules and regulations. There are a number of changes and improvements which he desires to make in the management of the Library and which he has set forth in his report to Congress. He waits to see whether we will give him the money to carry out those rules and regulations which the law authorizes and requires him to make.

I come here now with an amendment strictly in accordance with the provisions of the law—not requiring him to make any change and not dictating to him what changes he shall make, but giving him the money to make such changes as under the provisions of law he may desire to make. He has expressed that desire in an official report to Congress. It follows that my amendment is not inconsistent with any law whatsoever.

The rule upon which the gentleman from Pennsylvania bases his point of order provides that—

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill or be in order as an amendment thereto for any expenditure not previously authorized by law unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress.

This is an appropriation for an "object already in progress." The object of this proposed appropriation is not to do anything new.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman will allow me to correct him. The language of the rule is not "object," but "public works."

Mr. HANDY. I am reading from the Manual, and the language is, "unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress." That is the exact language. This is a public object. In one sense it is a great public work. At the same time it is certainly an "object." My amendment does not provide for any object or purpose different from that already provided for.

The amendment proposes to make an appropriation for a most desirable change, which the Librarian wishes to make under the authority of law. Why should we stop at the paltry expense of $15,000? Why should we fail to give him the means to carry on this work properly? I can not see that the amendment is at all obnoxious to the existing law.

There is a difference between the law that was quoted yesterday and the present law in this: The law that gave the Joint Committee of Congress on the Library the power to make rules and regulations was the law under which that committee had taken action. On the assumption that that law was still in operation the gentleman from Pennsylvania might with great force urge that, since action had been taken under that law and rules and regulations had been made, they had the force and effect of law. But this new law requiring the Librarian to make rules and regulations is a law under which he has not yet acted. He has expressed the purpose to make such rules and regulations, but has not yet done so. So this appropriation is strictly in accordance with the existing law. It proposes to enable a public officer to carry out the duties imposed upon him by law. It gives him money to carry on his work.

Mr. McRAE. Does the amendment of the gentleman provide for anything except an increase in the amount of the appropriation?

Mr. HANDY. It provides for nothing except an increase in the amount of money appropriated. It does not give to the Librarian any direction; it does not attempt to say to him "You shall or you shall not do a certain thing." It simply provides—

For additional expense involved in keeping the Library open daily from 9 a. m. to 10 p. m., $15,000.

That is all. If the Librarian fails to make the regulation for the opening of the Library during the hours named this appropriation will fall and be of no effect.

Mr. McRAE. Why not simply increase the sum appropriated, leaving out all the other phraseology? Such an amendment will certainly be in order.

Mr. HANDY. That was the sole purpose of it. The phraseology is merely intended to make clear the motive of the amendment making the increased appropriation.

Mr. McRAE. You are satisfied that he wants to make the regulation. Now, all he wants to enable him to do that is the money.

Mr. HANDY. I have no means of satisfying myself of the Librarian's desire except by the report which is printed in the RECORD of this morning.

Mr. McRAE. It seems to me that by a slight change in the amendment you could eliminate all doubt of the parliamentary status of the matter.

Mr. HANDY. I do not know whether the gentleman from Pennsylvania would be willing to allow me now to modify the proposition.

Mr. McRAE. But you can do that without consent.

Mr. BRUCKER. Let me ask the gentleman if the limitation of time would not be construed as a limitation upon his right to regulate the establishment and fix rules for its government?

Mr. HANDY. I do not think that. The $15,000 is given to the Librarian to use for the purpose of keeping the Library open for a longer period of hours. If he does not desire to use it in that manner, the money is as if it were not appropriated and will not be used.

Mr. BRUCKER. If that is the construction you place on it why not eliminate that provision of the amendment?

Mr. HANDY. I would be glad to do so, but I think it is in such shape that I may not be permitted at this time to modify the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Just change the amendment to leave the Library open additional hours.

Mr. HANDY. Then how would this do?

For additional expense for keeping the Library open as much longer as the Librarian may desire.

I should be glad to make it in that way, or put it in this form:

For keeping the Library open as much longer as the Librarian of Congress may decide, $15,000.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think the gentleman would have the right to modify the amendment anyhow. It occurs to me that the modification would be entirely in order.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will state, Mr. Chairman, that the print of the report of the Librarian of Congress has not been given out as yet or published for the use of Congress. I asked him for a rough copy of the report, and it was sent to me in print. We have applied to the Librarian of Congress by telephone for information, and I hope to have it here before the discussion ends.

The rules made by the joint committee are the rules which he reports now as being in operation in that establishment. He has, so far as he is concerned, adopted the report of the committee and made notorious the rules framed by the joint committee.

Now, it is within his power to make a change in the rules, according to the act for the organization of the new Library and for the control of it. As far as he has acted, he has promulgated the old rules.

Now comes a suggestion or a recommendation on his part that he would ask Congress to report a larger appropriation in order to continue the hours from 4 p. m. until 10 p. m., and in connection with that he submits that which will be the increased expenditure, namely, $15,000. That pertains, however, only to his work in the Library. Mr. Greene, the superintendent of the building, having full custodianship and full control of the operating machinery, the illumination of the building, and so on, says that if the hours are extended he will ask an appropriation of $12,000 additional. In other words, the opening of the Library for the increased hours signifies the increase of force for both the Superintendent and the Librarian, and the sum total of $30,000 additional expenses.

Your committee felt that in the condition of the Library as it is to-day, with nothing but a card catalogue (for there is no catalogue that a student can consult), with the same rules governing as to the limitation of the time, etc., that it was injudicious at this time to incorporate such a provision as that now proposed, especially in view of the fact that under present rules, if additional work is required of subordinates, he can order it.

Different suggestions—suggestions to change the hours—were before the committee. The proposition was made yesterday, and it was ruled on by the Chairman. That power is to a certain extent already in the hands of the Librarian. The reading of the law discloses the fact that the last act gave that power to him.

The Librarian informs us he has made his rules. There they are. The very proposition of the gentleman changes the rule, because he comes to Congress and asks that the rule may be changed that has been promulgated by the Librarian, opening the Library from 10 until 4, so that it may be open until 10 p. m. I claim that that is a complete revolution of existing law, because Congress determines and takes it from the Librarian.

Mr. HANDY. Will the gentleman permit a question there? How and when and in what way did the Librarian promulgate the rule?

Mr. BINGHAM. He printed it—published it.

Mr. CANNON. Whether he has or not, this is legislation.

Mr. HANDY. I understand that the Librarian desires that the Library shall be open in the evening.

Mr. BINGHAM. Now, I simply make the point of order against the gentleman's proposition that the conditions have not changed at all; that there the rule says that the Librarian shall make the rules governing the Library. He has made the rule. He has submitted in his report a recommendation and an appeal to the judgment of the House, that the sentiment may crystallize into a proposition. Perhaps a little later I may be one of the most earnest advocates of the gentleman's proposition, but at this time I consider it my duty to make the point of order, because I consider this a bad move to make with reference to the Library at this time.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard for a moment on the point of order. The gentleman from Delaware [Mr. HANDY] submits his amendment and claims it is in order under clause 2 of Rule XXI. If it is in order at all it must be under that clause. Now, then, it is clear that it is not in order under that clause of the rule authorizing an appropriation for a "public work or an object" already in progress, because the proposition itself seeks to initiate a "public object," seeks to make a new departure with respect to the work of the Library. Therefore it can not be in order under that clause of the rule. If in order, it is because of some law authorizing it. The existing law gives to the Librarian the power to make regulations. If the Librarian makes regulations opening the Library to the public at night, as he has the authority to do, that regulation becomes law within the meaning of the rule, and then the amendment of the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. HANDY] would be in order; but the Librarian has not made any such regulation, as I understand, and therefore the amendment is not in order at this time.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. May I ask the gentleman from Missouri a question?

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. As I understand it, before the Librarian can change the rules which now govern the hours of keeping the Library open, he must have additional employees and must incur additional expense. Now, the question which I wish to ask is this: How can the Librarian change existing rules unless Congress has prior to that time done precisely what this amendment proposes to do, put at his disposal an appropriation?

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is right.

Mr. DOCKERY. Right, and yet wrong. The law expressly gives to the Librarian the right to make regulations, which have all the force of law. That is, he has a right to incur a liability under that provision of the law heretofore adopted. He has a right to make a regulation which will open this Library at night. If the Librarian makes a regulation of that sort, it has all the force of a law enacted by the two Houses and approved by the President. Therefore I hold that this amendment is not in order; but I want to say just a word on the question——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I should like to ask my colleague a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If you can not get the Library open at night in this way, how can you get it open at night?

Mr. DOCKERY. By initiatory action on the part of the Librarian.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, let me ask you if you are not in this fix: The Librarian can not open the Library at night because he has not got the money to open it of a night, and we can not appropriate the money because the Librarian has not made the rule. Is not that the situation?

Mr. DOCKERY. No, sir; I think not. I think under the power given by the statute the Librarian has the right to incur a liability, under a regulation. But I want to say just one word, if the House will permit me, aside from the point of order.

I favor the proposition of the gentleman from Delaware, but desire to do something more, and I am quite certain that it will be accomplished on an appropriation bill that will follow this after the holidays. I want to do what the gentleman from Delaware does—that is, to open the Library to the people of the United States at night—but I desire to do more. I want to accomplish two purposes. I desire to call in the miscellaneous books from the Departments and put them in the new Library building, and then repeal the law authorizing this city to erect or rent a building for a public library. We have nearly 700,000 volumes in the Congressional Library now, and perhaps 350,000 more in the Departments.

These volumes should be available to the people of this city, under proper regulations for their care and safety, and also to the people of the United States who sojourn here. In connection with the proposition of the gentleman from Delaware, which is a most worthy one, I would repeal, as I have heretofore stated, the statute authorizing a public library in this city. Now, then, if you open the Congressional Library at this time—and I sympathize with the enthusiasm of the distinguished gentleman from Delaware—if you do this now, the result will be to leave on the statute books the law authorizing a public library. I opposed that law, but Congress has repeatedly—by a close vote, it is true—refused to appropriate the money to execute it.

The law is inimical to the general library interests of this city. Therefore I ask to join the repeal proposition with that of the gentleman from Delaware. Call in the miscellaneous books, and then we will have the library interests in this splendid capital city on a proper basis. I am quite sure that a proposition embodying this idea will be placed in some bill after the holidays. If I did not so believe I would favor the pending proposition.

Mr. McRAE. Does not my friend believe that if you had this law and you had opened the Library at night that we would never have had on the statute books the other law that he speaks of. The very fact that the Library was not opened made it necessary to build another one.

Mr. DOCKERY. I think the gentleman from Arkansas is correct. I think if——

Mr. McRAE. Then why is not the right way to get rid of that statute to pass this amendment?

Mr. DOCKERY. The statute remains. An estimated appropriation is submitted, I think, in the District appropriation bill for the conduct of a public library during the ensuing year.

Mr. HANDY. The gentleman from Missouri understands that my amendment does not affect anything but an amount of money. It does not change law.

Mr. DOCKERY. Then it accomplishes nothing if it does not change the law.

Mr. HANDY. Under the law the Librarian has full power to make these changes. He only lacks the money.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have raised a point of order, and I call for a decision.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I wish to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, is there not a right to perfect the amendment before the House?

The CHAIRMAN. What is the point of order that the gentleman raises?

Mr. BINGHAM. My point of order is that the proposition of the gentleman changes existing law.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. But that is no point of order to my amendment; certainly not until it is read.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the point of order that which was passed over yesterday evening, or is it upon any new amendment?

Mr. BINGHAM. I only recur to the ruling of the Chair on the point of order, and the point of order was made yesterday. The gentleman from Delaware claimed that it was made under a statute not now in existence. I call the attention of the Chair to the act of last Congress, which indicated how the rules and regulations of the Library of Congress should be made, and upon that I make the point of order that there is no law authorizing it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule on the proposition as it was presented to the Chair yesterday, and if the remarks made to-day were simply to review that ruling, the Chair is ready to rerule.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is all.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, I rise to take issue upon that proposition, if I am in order. I can not see how we could have recurred to the proposition except for the purpose of considering the proposition not as to how any one amendment bore upon it, but as to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Delaware, and any amendment in order under the rules to that amendment which would become under the rules, if adopted, a substitute for the amendment, taking its place—how it all bore upon it. It seems to me when we recurred to it we recurred to it for the purpose of amendment, and there is nothing——

Mr. BINGHAM. That was not the understanding of what I asked the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. What the understanding was I do not know. There was nothing expressly said——

Mr. BINGHAM. Oh, yes; there was.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. By you which expressly meant what you now contend.

Mr. BINGHAM. My request to the Chair was simply that there might be an opportunity for a revision of his ruling upon the point of order made by me, in view of the fact that the authority upon which the ruling had been based was a statute which had been repealed, and for which another law had been substituted, placing elsewhere the authority to make rules and regulations for the Library. That was my understanding of the request of the gentleman from Delaware. The merits of the proposition had nothing to do with the question.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Of course not, and I am not discussing the merits, nor shall I discuss them. I am merely seeking to amend the amendment offered by the gentleman from Delaware in such manner as to remove all possible objection to it based upon the rule. In my opinion, the amendment which I hold in my hand, if adopted by the gentleman from Delaware—and he has a right to adopt it, if it is in order and he chooses—will remove all possible parliamentary objection to the consideration of his amendment by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The understanding of the Chair is that the request made was simply to recur to this part of the bill for the purpose of reviewing the ruling of the Chair made yesterday on the amendment of the gentleman from Delaware, as that gentleman desired to present further argument upon the point. If it is now desired to open the subject further, if the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] or the gentleman in charge of the bill [Mr. BINGHAM] asks that, the Chair will leave it to the committee to determine whether the paragraph shall be opened for consideration or whether the consideration shall be restricted to the point of order made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HANDY. Mr. Chairman, I would very much like to have the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi offered, but my understanding with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] was such that if he thinks this is not one of the things we may do, I feel that I must defer to his views.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I understand the ruling of the Chair to be that after the Chair has passed upon the point of order it will then be in order for me to move my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Only by unanimous consent. The committee has already passed the paragraph, and has recurred to it only at the request of the gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask the Chair for a ruling.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment as offered yesterday is, in the judgment of the Chair, new legislation in this, that under existing law the Librarian of Congress has the power to regulate the hours when the Library shall be kept open, and if the amendment of the gentleman from Delaware is adopted it will operate as a restriction upon the discretion which the Librarian of Congress now possesses under existing law. Hence it would be new legislation and subject to the point of order. The Chair adheres to his ruling upon that point. The gentleman from Delaware today presents the further proposition that it is competent to offer this amendment under a clause of the second paragraph of Rule XXI, which I will read:

2. No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress.

That clause of the rule has been construed again and again by the Committee of the Whole, and its language has been held to relate only to public works of a tangible nature. The question was considered in the Fifty-fourth Congress on the Agricultural appropriation bill. The same point that is now made by the gentleman from Delaware was made then, and it was held that the amendment was not in order. An appeal was taken from the ruling and the Chair was sustained by the committee. The present occupant of the chair holds that the Librarian is an executive officer of the Government, and that this clause of the rule does not apply to him. The Chair adheres to his ruling made yesterday that the amendment of the gentleman from Delaware is not in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to present an amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. To that I can not agree. I desire to go on with the bill. The gentleman has other places where he can offer amendments.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Other places where I can offer this amendment?

Mr. BINGHAM. Where the gentleman can get legislation if he needs it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I would like it now, if I can get it.

Mr. BINGHAM. We have passed this paragraph.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I understand that if the amendment is offered now at all, it will be offered by your grace, and it is to your grace that I am appealing.

Mr. HANDY. Mr. Chairman, in view of the ruling of the Chair, I wish to say that I take great comfort from the statement of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] that we shall get this thing done at this session of Congress upon some other appropriation bill.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, there was an agreement made yesterday by unanimous consent that I should be allowed to offer an amendment to a clause on page 61 of the bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. Does the gentleman prefer to present that now, or wait until we get through with the rest of the bill?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I prefer to present it now.

Mr. BINGHAM. All right.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Before submitting the amendment, I should like to have an explanation from the gentleman in charge of the bill as to the reason of the difference which has been made between the expenses of the legislative assembly of Arizona and those of New Mexico.

Mr. BINGHAM. I believe that the amount of the difference is $1,750.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Yes, sir. But Arizona has as much rent to pay as New Mexico.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will read to the gentleman something with which he is no doubt familiar, although it may have escaped his attention for the moment. I read from a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, dated May 18, 1892, addressed to the then chairman of the Committee on Appropriations:

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith, for the consideration of the House Committee on Appropriations, copies of the letter of the First Comptroller of the 17th instant and its inclosures, looking to an appropriation of $2,500, to be used to rent a suitable hall and rooms, and to provide furniture for the same, for the use of the Territorial legislature of New Mexico, the Territorial building where the legislature has of late assembled, and its contents, having been destroyed by fire.

The letter of the Comptroller of the Treasury Department referred to in the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury is dated May 17, 1892, and is as follows:

SIR: I have the honor to recommend that you submit to Congress an estimate for a further appropriation for $2,500 for legislative expenses of the Territory of New Mexico for the fiscal year 1893, so much of this appropriation as may be necessary to be used to rent a suitable hall and rooms, and provide furniture for the same, for the use of the Territorial legislature of New Mexico, the Territorial building where the legislature has of late assembled, and its contents, having been destroyed by fire.

That is the reason we propose to appropriate $1,750 more in the one case than in the other. We have followed the estimates.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The only reason, then, is that New Mexico happened to have her capitol destroyed by a fire after getting an appropriation from the Government for the capitol. Arizona has been all the time paying rent by taxation of the people and getting no reimbursement. I protest against the distinction that is made. I declare that New Mexico does not get nearly what she ought to have for her legislative expenses. I move, therefore, to amend by striking out, in line 6, page 61, "$24,250" and inserting "$26,000." This will make the appropriation correspond exactly with that in the case of New Mexico, the conditions being exactly the same. Our Territory is obliged to pay the same incidental expenses as New Mexico for rent, light, fuel, ice, etc., yet in the case of Arizona hardly enough is appropriated to pay the legislative per diem.

Mr. BINGHAM. We have followed and allowed the amounts named in the estimates, the addition being given to New Mexico because of the conditions stated.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. There is no difference in the conditions.

Mr. BINGHAM. The details given in the paragraph appropriating for legislative expenses of Arizona embrace, as in the case of New Mexico, the item "rent." There is no disposition on the part of Congress to pay more rent than we are now paying.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Let us see the exact reading of the two appropriations. For Arizona the appropriation for legislative expenses is "for rent, messenger, postage, stationery, fuel, lights, printing, and incidental expenses for secretary's office." For New Mexico the appropriation for legislative expenses is "for rent, light, fuel, ice, stationery, record files, record casings, printing, postage, clerks, messenger and porter, and incidentals in secretary's office." There is no more necessity for an increased appropriation in the one case than in the other.

Mr. BINGHAM. Of course we could not go into every minor detail. We have simply followed the estimates and the preceding action on this subject. I have stated the reason why a larger allowance has been made in the case of New Mexico.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. With the declaration that I know our Territory does not get what she is entitled to in this matter, I insist on having my amendment voted on.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. SMITH of Arizona, there were—ayes 53, noes 48.

Mr. BINGHAM. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BINGHAM and Mr. SMITH of Arizona were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 58, noes 59.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BINGHAM. It is now 5 o'clock. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOPKINS reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the legislative, executive, and judicial bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

THE BANKRUPTCY BILL.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary made report to-day on the bankruptcy bill. I ask unanimous consent for the indulgence of the House until two days after the holidays, that the minority of the committee may have leave to file their views.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. TODD, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

And then, on motion of Mr. BINGHAM (at 5 o'clock and 1 minute p. m.), the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

SENATE.

FRIDAY, December 17, 1897.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on motion of Mr. MILLS, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

REINDEER IN ALASKA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 15th instant, the report of Dr. Sheldon Jackson upon the introduction of domestic reindeer into the District of Alaska for 1897; which, on motion of Mr. TELLER, was, with the accompanying report, ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

IRRIGATION OF SOUTHERN UTE RESERVATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, pursuant to the Indian appropriation act of June 7, 1897, authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to confer with the owners of the Montezuma Valley Canal in the county of Montezuma and the State of Colorado, or any other parties, for the purpose of securing by the Government water rights, or for the supply of so much water, or both, as he may deem necessary for the irrigation of that part of the Montezuma Valley lying within the boundaries of the Southern Ute Indian Reservation, etc., a report of the United States Indian inspector, J. George Wright, upon the subject; which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

AGREEMENT WITH CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW INDIANS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in connection with Department letter of May 18, 1897, submitting an agreement between the commissioners of the United States to negotiate with the Five Civilized Tribes and the commissioners on the part of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians, and with Department letter of July 16, 1897, together with certain protests against the approval or ratification of the agreement, a copy of a paper which purports to be the objections by the Choctaw-Chickasaw Union party to this agreement; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Select Committee on the Five Civilized Tribes of Indians, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FAIRBANKS presented a petition of the Silent Army of Deaf Soldiers, Sailors, and Marines, of Indianapolis, Ind., praying that they be granted an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. QUAY. I present a petition of the Trades League of the city of Philadelphia, which is a commercial body of much consequence. The petition is on a very important subject, and it is very brief. I should like to have it read and printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

TRADES LEAGUE OF PHILADELPHIA,
Philadelphia, December 14, 1897.

At a meeting of the board of managers of the Trades League of Philadelphia, held December 9, 1897, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

"Resolved, That the Trades League of Philadelphia, an organization of upward of 2,000 business firms, regards with deep interest the overtures now being made by the Dominion of Canada for closer and better business communion between that country and the United States. All good principles of business and of international comity demand that our relations with our closest neighbors should be as reciprocal as the best interests of our country at large will warrant. The common interests of humanity, civilization, commerce, and progress of the American continent demand that such overtures, offered in good faith, should be received with good will, and an effort made to reach a basis of reciprocity which would be alike fair to the United States and the Dominion of Canada and conducive to increased trade relations between the two countries."

THE TRADES LEAGUE OF PHILADELPHIA,
W. W. FOULKROD, President.
J. N. FITZGERALD, Secretary.

Mr. BACON presented a memorial of the Retail Clerks' Protective Association of Savannah, Ga., remonstrating against any change being made in the present system of ticket brokerage; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. CULLOM presented a memorial of the Federation of Labor of Chicago, Ill., remonstrating against any change being made in the present system of ticket brokerage; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of Dunlap Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, of Dunlap, Ill., praying for the establishment of postal savings banks; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a petition of the Hotel Association of New York City, praying for the passage of the so-called anti-scalping bill; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. BUTLER. I present a petition and resolutions of the mayor and city council of Newbern, N. C., praying that an appropriation be made for the repair of the Federal road leading from Trent River to the national cemetery near that city. The Federal road was conveyed to the United States Government on condition that it should be kept in repair. The petition and resolutions passed by the city council state that the road is in very bad condition and that an additional appropriation should be made to keep it in repair. I move that the resolutions and petition be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BATE. I present a memorial from the Cherokee tribe, which includes the action of the council, and I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives, United States Congress:

The undersigned delegates, recently appointed by act of the Cherokee National Council to "represent the Cherokee Nation before the United States Government," would beg leave to respectfully represent for favorable consideration that they have been directed in their instructions to "apply to the United States Government to rescind the provision in the act of Congress approved June 7, 1897, which, from and after January 1, 1898, will operate to deprive the courts of the Cherokee Nation of the jurisdiction recognized and granted to them by the fifth article of the treaty of 1835 and the thirteenth article of the treaty of 1866."

The right to govern themselves has always been inherent in the Cherokee people, derived, as they claim, in the language of the Supreme Court, from the "Great Spirit," and was never denied to them in all their intercourse with either Great Britain, Spain, or France. In fact, it was never denied by the United States herself until quite recently. The truth of this proposition is witnessed by the public transactions had between them and the European States just mentioned, together with those between them and the United States, altogether extending from the time of the discovery of the continent. It is true that, in the opinion of some, such statements are merely the expression of sentiment, but the facts of history can not be swept away by a bare asseveration.

The fifth article of the treaty of 1835 reads as follows: "The United States hereby covenants and agrees that the lands ceded (those now occupied and owned by the Cherokees) to the Cherokee Nation in the foregoing articles shall in no future time, without their consent, be included within the territorial limits of any State or Territory; but they shall secure to the Cherokee Nation the right, by their national council, to make and carry into effect all such laws as they may deem necessary for the government and protection of the persons and property, within their own country, belonging to their own people, or such persons as have connected themselves with them." Evidently this article does not as an act of grace confer upon the Cherokee people as a new investiture the right to govern themselves, but only agrees to "secure" and perpetuate a right which already existed. It should be remembered, too, that this guaranty, so solemnly pledged by the Government, was not a free gift, but was made in return for valuable consideration in cession of the Cherokee country east of the Mississippi to the United States.

Further, in confirmation of the theory herein advanced touching the right of self-government, the opinion of Chief Justice Marshall may be quoted as expressed in the case of Worcester vs. The State of Georgia (6 Pet., 515). That learned jurist, referring to history, treaties, and laws, said:

"Certain it is that our history furnishes no example, from the first settlement of our country, of any attempt on the part of the Crown to interfere with the internal affairs of the Indians further than to keep out the agents of foreign powers, who, as traders or others, might seduce them into foreign alliances. The King purchased their lands when they were willing to sell, at a price they were willing to sell, but never coerced a surrender of them. He also purchased their alliance and dependence by subsidies, but never intruded so far as respected themselves."

The general views of Great Britain with regard to the Indians were detailed by Mr. Stewart at Mobile in the presence of several persons of distinction soon after the peace of 1763. Toward the conclusion he says:

"Lastly, I inform you that it is the King's order to all his governors and subjects to treat the Indians with justice and humanity, and to forbear encroachments on the territory allotted to them. Accordingly all individuals are prohibited from purchasing any of your lands; but as you know your white brethren can not feed you when you visit them unless you give them ground to plant, it is expected that you will cede lands to the King for that purpose. But whenever you shall be pleased to surrender any of your territory to His Majesty, it must be done for the future at a public meeting of your nation, when the governors of the provinces or the superintendent shall be present and obtain the consent of all your people. The boundaries of your hunting grounds will be accurately fixed and no settlement permitted to be made upon them. As you may be assured that all treaties with your people will be faithfully kept, so it is expected that you also will be careful to observe them.

"This treaty, thus explicitly recognizing the national character of the Cherokees and their right to self-government, thus guaranteeing their lands, assuming the duty of protection, and, of course, pledging the faith of the United States for that protection, has been frequently renewed, and is now in full force.

"All these acts, especially that of 1802, which is still in force, manifestly consider the several Indian nations as distinct political communities, having territorial boundaries within which their authority is exclusive, and having a right to all the lands within those boundaries, which is not only acknowledged but guaranteed by the United States.

"The Indian nations had always been considered as distinct, independent political communities, retaining their original natural rights, as the undisputed possessors of the soil, from time immemorial, with the single exception of that imposed by irresistible power, which excluded them from intercourse with any other European potentates than the first discoverer of particular regions claimed; and this was a restriction which those European potentates imposed on themselves as well as on the Indians. The very term 'nation,' so generally applied to them, means a people distinct from others. The Constitution, by declaring treaties already made, as well as those to be made, to be the supreme law of the land, has adopted and sanctioned the previous treaties with the Indian nations, and consequently admits their rank among those powers who are capable of making treaties. The very words 'treaty' and 'nation' are words of our language, selected in our diplomatic and legislative proceedings, by ourselves, having each a definite and well-understood meaning. We have applied them to Indians as we have applied them to the other nations of the earth. They are applied to all in the same sense.

"In opposition to this original right, possessed by the undisputed occupants of every country, to recognition of that right which is evidenced by history in every change through which we have passed are placed the charters granted by the monarch of a distant and distinct region, parceling out a territory in possession of others whom he could not remove, and did not attempt to remove, and the cession made of his claims by the treaty of peace.

"The actual state of things at the time, and all history since, explain those charters; and the King of Great Britain, at the treaty of peace, could cede only what belonged to his Crown. These newly asserted titles can derive no aid from the articles so often repeated in Indian treaties, extending to them first the protection of Great Britain and afterwards that of the United States. These articles are associated with others recognizing their title to self-government. The very fact of repeated treaties with them recognizes it, and the settled doctrine of the law of nations is that a weaker power does not surrender its independence, its right of self-government, by associating with a stronger one and taking its protection. A weak state, in order to provide for its safety, may place itself under the protection of one more powerful without stripping itself of the right of government and ceasing to be a state. Examples of this kind are not wanting in Europe. 'Tributary and feudatory states,' says Vattel, 'do not thereby cease to be sovereign and independent states so long as self-government and sovereign and independent authority are left in the administration of the state. At the present day more than one state may be considered as holding its right of self-government under the guaranties of one or more allies.'

"The language used in treaties should not be construed to their (the Indians') prejudice. If words be made use of which are susceptible of a more extended meaning than their plain import as connected with the tenor of this treaty, they should be considered as used only in the latter sense. To contend that the word 'allotted,' in reference to the land granted to the Indians in certain treaties, indicates a favor conferred, rather than a right acknowledged, would, it would seem to me, do injustice to the understanding of the parties. How the words of the treaty were understood by this unlettered people, rather than their critical meaning, should form the rule of construction.

"It has been shown that the treaties and laws referred to come within the due exercise of the constitutional powers of the Federal Government; that they remain in full force, and consequently must be considered as the supreme law of the land. These laws throw a shield over the Cherokee Indians. They guarantee to them their rights of occupancy, of self-government, and the full enjoyment of those blessings which might be obtained in their humble condition. But by the enactments of the State of Georgia this shield is broken in pieces, the infant institutions of the Cherokees are abolished, and their laws annulled. Infamous punishment is denounced against them for the exercise of those rights which have been most solemnly guaranteed to them by the national faith."

Thus far the language of the court.

That it was the purpose of the Government, as well as the understanding of the Cherokees, in negotiating the treaties under which the Cherokees agreed to surrender their ancient homes and the graves of their ancestors and children in Georgia, Alabama, and Tennessee and remove to the strange country in the far West, that the right of self-government should remain inviolate, may be clearly seen by consulting the treaties from time to time made with the other tribes of Indian Territory—the Choctaws, Creeks, Chickasaws, and Seminoles.

But as the most convenient way to present other reason for the rescinding of said provisions of the act above named will be to transcribe from the instructions enacted by the national council for the guidance of this delegation, the said delegation are instructed further to represent: That the Cherokees have of late years become aware and assured that the political destiny of the Five Tribes of the Indian Territory is bound to be the same and have, therefore, in anticipation, labored for such a mutual understanding of these tribes as will enable them all to combine and occupy a common ground of relationship to the United States in whatever changes may be attempted to be made in respect to that relationship, and that these tribes have a right to ask sufficient time for that purpose; that being made aware of the desire and policy of the United States Government to finally absorb these Indian governments and divide their lands in severalty, the Cherokees did appoint a commission to confer with a United States commission already appointed to further those purposes, with the view and intent of so graduating any really necessary changes as would not, on account of rash and unnecessary haste in making them, result in serious injury and, perhaps, the destruction of the Five Tribes; that, while the Cherokee commission was at work conferring with the Dawes Commission, and expecting and desiring to come to such an understanding as might properly be submitted for ratification to the governments, respectively, that appointed the commissions, certain obstacles intervened or were interposed that made further conference with the design of coming to such an agreement impossible until such obstacles should be removed (the obstacles here mentioned being stated in a communication from the Cherokee commission to the Dawes Commission, dated October 22, 1897), and the said delegation are hereby authorized to refer to the said communication in explanation of the present position of the Cherokee Nation as regards the making of a new agreement with the United States, and for that purpose the said communication is hereby made a part of these instructions.*

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That the said delegation are further authorized and instructed to respectfully apply to the United States Government to rescind the provision of the act of Congress approved June 7, 1897, which, from and after January 1, 1898, will operate to deprive the courts of the Cherokee Nation of the jurisdiction recognized and guaranteed to them by the fifth article of the treaty of 1835 and the thirteenth article of the treaty of 1866.

In making such application the said delegation are instructed to refer to and make use of whatever proceedings and decisions may be found of record in support thereof, and to assure the United States Government that the Cherokee Nation does not desire or propose to antagonize any policy of the said Government in relation to the Indian Territory if such policy will not operate to the injury of the Cherokee people, or will not deprive them of rights they regard as vital, and which are recognized and guaranteed to them by treaty with the United States.

The said delegation are further instructed to represent that the national council had appointed a commission to negotiate with a commission of the United States with reference to proposed modifications of existing treaty, and that the two commissions had convened with such understanding and for such object when the act of Congress was proposed and finally passed, in which, without stated reasons or notice, the United States Government assumed and exercised authority to annul certain provisions of treaty unless the Cherokees would consent to the abrogation of other provisions, or at least assent to whatever terms and conditions in a new agreement the United States commission and Congress might impose upon the Cherokee Nation; that the Cherokee Nation, represented by its commission, felt it to be impossible to continue negotiations while the nation was thus under compulsion to grant all that might be demanded by the United States or lose the nation's right of self-government—while they were thus threatened with the disregard of an existing agreement by the United States unless they should consent to make another agreement which would be entitled to no more respect and would be fully as liable to be disregarded in its turn. The delegation are therefore directed to ask to have the said provision of the act of Congress rescinded, in order that the Cherokees may become again enabled to freely and unconstrainedly consider and act upon whatever modifications of their relations may be proposed.

*See toward the sequel.

ACTION OF THE FULL-BLOOD CHEROKEES.

Resolved by the Keetoowah convention, That a communication be addressed to the President setting forth that it is impracticable, unsafe, and dangerous for the Cherokees to negotiate an agreement with the Dawes Commission at the present time. The act of Congress passed last June provides for a transfer of jurisdiction from our courts to the United States courts, which is in plain violation of our treaties. We ask that this be rescinded.

We fully understand our situation. We know it is a grave one. The new conditions would be foreign to us. Our liberty would be canceled and our people gradually made homeless by the shrewd land sharks. Yet we are confident that President McKinley will never give up the protection due our people. In your late struggle for liberty we as soldiers of your country helped you defend the Stars and Stripes.

We would therefore most sincerely pray the United States Congress, in accordance with the plighted faith of the Government, to protect us in the enjoyment of all our rights and wait for us to negotiate a treaty until our people become willing to give their consent.

DANIEL REDBIRD, Chairman.

This delegation would, therefore, most respectfully hereby enter a most solemn remonstrance on behalf of the Cherokee Nation against the operation of said provision of said act, and ask that it be rescinded.

Very respectfully,

WALLER A. DUNCAN, Chairman.

HON. HENRY L. DAWES, TAMS BIXBY, A. S. MCKENNON, A. B. MONTGOMERY and FRANK C. ARMSTRONG, United States Commissioners to the Five Civilized Tribes.

GENTLEMEN: The unfeigned veneration which we entertain for the United States, as well as the high esteem in which you and each of you are personally held both by ourselves and the whole Cherokee people, have made it matter of much regret on our part that negotiation between your commission and ours, touching the extinguishment of the "tribal or national title to our lands" and other matters preparatory to the creation of a State of the Union to embrace our country, should terminate without reaching a mutually satisfactory conclusion. The same high considerations also induce us to feel disinclined to allow any doubt to exist in your minds as to the causes of our hesitancy in acceding to the overtures of the Government as presented to us by your honorable body. In reference to making any agreement, this commission was instructed as follows: "The Cherokee Commission are also authorized to agree with the Dawes Commission * * * to such changes only which will secure and confirm the right, title, and possession of the citizens of the Cherokee Nation to the lands conveyed to them by said patent, and which will vest in said citizens equally undisputed and exclusive control and ownership of the whole of the country conveyed by said patent" not heretofore sold or retroceded to the United States.

In December last, at Muscogee, this commission signified in writing to your commission that they were authorized to enter into negotiations with your commission with reference to the proposal of the Government relating to the extinguishment of our national title to the lands of the Cherokee Nation, together with other matters, and that they were ready to proceed with the business, but only upon the propositions submitted by you and within the limits of the Cherokee Nation, as required by act of the national council, when it was agreed by your commission and ours that negotiations would be entered upon at Tahlequah early in January following. But owing to the absence of your commission from this country the contemplated meeting of the two commissions at Tahlequah never took place.

It was soon after the two commissions met at this place last May that your propositions to allot the whole of the Cherokee domain was modified by a preemptory order addressed to your commission from the Interior Department at Washington to reserve from allotment 157,000 acres. The order from the Interior Department rendered it impossible for your commission to comply with your first proposition, or for our commission to comply with our instructions. Furthermore, we beg to say, this order from the Interior Department is entirely without authority of law and is plainly at variance with the decisions of the courts in the matter of the said Delaware claim.

A few days after and at the same conference, the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railway Company gave formal notice to both commissions that the Indian title to the Territory would be held to be extinguished by virtue of the allotment of the lands therein, and that at least 800,000 acres of the most valuable lands in the nation would be claimed by the company as having been granted by act of Congress upon the extinguishment of the "Indian title."

This commission is impliedly forbidden by their instructions to make any agreement with a design to allot that would entail litigation upon any citizen or bring his allotted tract in dispute. Nevertheless, a railroad corporation gives plain, though friendly, notice that as soon as the proposed allotment should be agreed to and effected, the right of the Cherokee citizens to 800,000 acres at least would be disputed, and, unless conceded, make matter for litigation between them and the company.

We trust your honorable commission will perceive that the pledge to negotiate, which we had in all good faith made, subsequent made impossible to keep without a violation of our instructions.

The greatest obstacle, however, to making a new agreement since June 7, 1897, is an act of Congress which vests the United States courts of the Territory with exclusive jurisdiction over all persons and over all matters, civil and criminal, within the Indian Territory, after January 1, 1898; provided in the meantime the Five Tribes, or any of them, did not make an agreement with your honorable commission that would satisfy and be ratified by Congress. Should any tribe make such an agreement, and the agreement should conflict with any portion or provision of the act, the ratified agreement should take precedence over the act where they did not agree. By this act of Congress, which no doubt was intended as a stimulus to the aboriginal tardiness of the Cherokees, you are estopped from treating in the line of your last propositions to continue our government until after the allotment, while, in plain violation of the most sacred promises of the Government and at variance with all rules of respectable business, fully one-half of the Cherokee government is smitten to the earth. While we would not presume to criticise any action of the Congress of the United States, we think it a duty to say for the information of all whom it may concern that scarcely anything more obstructive to the completion of an agreement with your commission could have been done than the passage of the act we are speaking about.

The immemorial right of self-government was recognized by the United States as belonging to the Cherokee Nation in the fifth article of the treaty of 1835, and the recognition was bought and paid for—among other things held to be valuable, if not invaluable, by the Cherokees—by their original homes east of the Mississippi. This right is now threatened to be forcibly wrested from this tribe, as also from the others, without notice or stated reason except what is implied by the condition attached to and contained in the act itself.

When the Five Tribes were removed West, the main inducement offered them was the promise of a patent in fee, the strongest assurance of security against trespass and intrusion known to civilization—an instrument that operates to protect the party to whom it is granted from interference by any power or person, not excepting the Government that makes the grant. Nothing is reserved but the right of eminent domain, which is one of the exceptions that prove the rule.

Sixty years have passed since then, and the tide of the white population which then threatened to engulf them has reached the Indians in their new homes, while the country to which they were removed and which was then included in what was then known as the "Great American Desert," is now described and coveted as a very Garden of Eden. But if selfish civilization threatens to deprive the remnant of the red race of their last home in the United States, a true and manly civilization, having foreseen the many pretenses and evasions of greed, has provided the red man with a means of defense that is known to be fully reliable and amply sufficient where white men are concerned. A patent was not intended to last for sixty years, while there is no need for it, and then go down before the first onslaught of plunderers. It is intended to serve as a bulwark for all time, and to enable the owners, white or red or black, to defy the worst that others may propose to do in the name of "progress."

Thus it happens that the Cherokees really own a certain described tract of land by deed from the United States, which they choose to hold in common, and that their consent must be obtained before they can be required to hold it in any other way. But in order to compel them, by indirect means, to take their country severally, notice has been served upon the tribe that if they do not make an agreement that Congress will ratify, the tribal courts shall be discontinued by force after next January.

It is known to be the policy of the United States to put an end to the common tenure of the Five Tribes. This same policy has been elsewhere applied to other Indian tribes who have had nothing better to depend on than their solemn treaties. But these Five Tribes have patents to their lands, promised and accepted as the treaties show, for the very purpose of preventing interference with their common tenure, and to enable the Indians to keep together and avoid the ruin which experience has shown to be sure to result from their too familiar intercourse with the grasping and unsympathetic white race.

But the Cherokees have other reasons for preferring their title in common to titles in severalty. When the Cherokees' commission engaged to negotiate with your commission upon your proposition to allot, it was not because they and their people did not hold their title in common in the very highest regard. They foresaw, however, that the United States Government would be urged by the popular voice to use every effort to remove the only obstacle to opening the Indian Territory to white settlement, and the commission hoped that they might be able, through a friendly agreement, to enable their people—the genuine Indians—to avoid some of the bad results of a "division in severalty," and to connect with the new title some of the advantages of a title in common.

So far as the mere allotment of the domain is concerned, without a change of title, the Cherokees have had a complete though simple system of allotment in satisfactory operation since they framed their first constitution in 1828. This system consists in securing to each and every citizen of the nation as much of the domain as he or she can make valuable by means of improvements and cultivation, while the domain is so used. The land itself remains "common property," subject to the occupancy and improvement by any citizen. It must be borne in mind, however, that the same constitution that secures to each citizen whatever improvements he may lawfully acquire, provides also that when he exceeds his rightful share to such an extent as to interfere with the rights of other citizens, the interference is called "monopoly," and the constitution then authorizes the legislature to interfere in its turn in order to curb developing greed by means of laws regulating the settlement of the common domain.

Consequently every Cherokee citizen is aware that as long as the Cherokee government shall last in its present form the national council has in its power to secure to each and every Cherokee citizen a just and fair proportion of the Cherokee domain for a home. And herein, on account of that one notable feature which exemplifies the golden rule in government, thoughtful Cherokees consider the Cherokee government the best, the most just and equal in the world.

On the other hand, intelligent Cherokees know that dividing the national domain so that each citizen may be enabled to permanently convey his interest to another will be as sure to result in a monopoly of real estate among the red race as it has been among the white. No individual, they hold, is authorized to divest himself and to convey to another the means placed in his hands by nature to make his living, namely, his share of the earth's surface, from which he is commanded to obtain sustenance by the "sweat of his brow."

One prominent and excellent feature of the common-tenure system among the Cherokees is that, while there can be no speculation in land or improvements, full allowance is made for the great differences between individual citizens as to their desires, enterprises, industry, and capacities. It is no part of the common property system in practice to give and to secure to each citizen full control over the whole of his share of the common domain, whether he wants to make use of it or not, upon the false theory that because all persons have equal rights to the bounties of Providence they are equally disposed and enabled to make use of those rights. Hence the fact that some of the citizens of the Cherokee Nation are deriving benefit from thousands of acres of the common domain, while others—in fact, by much the larger number—are satisfied with a less number of acres, is proof of the excellence of the common system, so long as none have cause for complaint that they are estopped by monopoly from using all the land they want.

That no complaint is made or has grounds to be made was satisfactorily shown to your honorable commission when representative full-blood Cherokees, who had been represented as driven to the barren hills by the aggressive enterprise of other citizens, assured your honorable commission at this place that they had no such complaints to make, and that when they should have occasion to seek a remedy for such an evil, they were aware that the remedy was in their own hands.

This nation is now required by superior power to choose between parting forever with this government of their fathers, which they think is so deserving of respect on its own merits, and parting with whatever other rights and privileges, which are equally theirs, your commission and Congress may require them to part with. Under this act of Congress the nation could not consent to make an agreement with your honorable commission without conceding the right of Congress to abolish our government. They are required to make such concessions as the United States may demand, in consideration of which concessions the United States do not propose to grant anything in return, but only to refrain from extinguishing a branch of the Cherokee government.

The Cherokees feel, therefore, that to make an agreement with the United States under present conditions of duress would be to concede the authority of the United States to abolish their tribal government at will. They hold this right as vested in them by treaty for the most valuable consideration possible to imagine—the relinquishment of their lands and homes east of the Mississippi.

Understand, we entreat, that the Cherokee Nation does not propose to resist what may be termed the "manifest destiny" of this Territory to eventually become a State of the United States. But the difference between the Territory's becoming a State when the Indians have become ready and before they have become ready to undertake the duties of American citizenship is the difference, to them, between life and death—the difference between a blessing and a curse.

More than half the citizen population of the Five Tribes are full-bloods who do not speak English. It is this class whose wishes and interests should be especially considered; to compel them in their present condition of ignorance and inexperience in the ways and doings of white men to compete on equal terms with a large promiscuous white population who have ever delighted to testify their contempt and antipathy to the red race would be almost certain to devote the remnant to a certain humiliation and speedy extermination.

When, three years since, the Five Tribes of this Territory refused to consent to the allotment of their lands, and to make other radical changes in their treaty relations with the United States, your honorable commission made an official report of their refusal, associated with the appalling account of the conditions of things throughout the entire Territory, unmodified by exception or word of commendation.

Yet upon the esteem and good will as well as upon the good faith of the American people these small nations know they must depend for their existence and safety. They venture to assert that your honorable commission was misled into forming the excessively severe judgment of the nation expressed in your report of 1894 by the misrepresentations and exaggerations of enemies whose wish and purpose is to overthrow the tribal governments of this Territory in order to profit by the wreck.

That representations were wantonly exaggerated to your honorable commission is shown beyond dispute by the acknowledged history and character of the Seminoles—one of the Five Tribes—ever since their removal West by the United States. The Seminoles have during the time stated and are now a thoroughly quiet, law-abiding, and progressive people, and would not suffer by comparison with any community.

Speaking particularly as to the Cherokees, the epidemic of violence and disorder which then temporarily afflicted the country and to which many respectable communities are at times subject was subdued as speedily as practicable by the concurrent exertions of Territorial officials, white and red, and has been succeeded by as healthy and orderly a state of society as exists among our white neighbors.

The Cherokees now enter a denial of the charge of corruption made against the national courts and challenge the production of proof to support it. In doing this they do not take issue with your honorable commission, but with enemies who, knowing the prodigious injury such a report would do these tribes if indorsed by your commission, have done their utmost to convince you, and through you the American public. And we make this unqualified denial the more freely and completely that they are ready to acknowledge and do acknowledge that a government with a corrupt judiciary is not only worthless for the grand purpose of all governments, but should be abolished as an active instrument of wrong and evil, and that they, the Cherokees, make no exception of their own government because it is theirs.

However much the Cherokees deprecate the possibility of offending a commission of the United States, whose word carries so much more weight than their own feeble and interested protestations in self-defense, it is because they realize the influence of your honorable commission to be so great that they can not rest content without a denial of accusations that would be fatal to the nation if true, and which will be equally fatal, though false, unless they are withdrawn or are modified within the bounds of truth.

In presenting the reasons and motives for their action in the premises, the Cherokees now ask to be allowed the same space, time, and patient hearing that was claimed by and accorded to their enemies and traducers who misled your commission before, and, by obtaining your indorsement of their false representations, succeeded in doing very great, though we hope no irreparable, injury and injustice to the entire Territory—the Cherokee Nation included.

In conclusion, we beg to say that we are unable to attach so light a character to the treaties between the Cherokee Nation and the United States as to think that they may be set aside without lawful reason by Congress. Our treaties are the evidences of our rights as related to the United States, and before we are asked to treat with the United States, all those rights should be acknowledged. The method should be to take our treaties as in full force, as they were understood to be when first executed, and then ask us to treat with reference to any modification that might be desired.

We have the honor to be, your obedient servants.

W. P. BOUDINOT,
Clerk Cherokee Commission.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a part and parcel of the instructions to the Cherokee delegation as stated in an act of the national council approved December 4, 1897.

C. J. HARRIS,
Executive Secretary.

Mr. ALLEN presented the affidavit of Elijah W. Penny, of Kansas, and the affidavit of Levi Magner, of Nebraska, in support of the bill (S. 2461) granting an increase of pension to S. H. Shirley; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

W. H. JENNINGS'S PAPER ON DIRECT LEGISLATION.

Mr. ALLEN. I have here a very important letter from Mr. W. H. Jennings, of Nebraska, on the subject of direct legislation. He has given the subject very careful thought and study, and I deem the letter of such importance that I ask the Senate that it be published as a miscellaneous document.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the request to publish as a document the letter of Mr. Jennings, of Nebraska? The Chair hears none, and that will be the order.

Mr. ALLEN. I move that the letter be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The motion was agreed to.

AFFAIRS IN CUBA.

Mr. PASCO. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] introduced a few days ago a resolution in reference to the condition of affairs in Cuba. I have received some papers relating to the same subject, which I ask may be referred to the same committee to be considered along with that resolution and others of a kindred nature. They consist of a communication from Manuel P. Delgado, of Key West, Fla., with correspondence from Nuevitas in La Lucha, a Spanish paper published in Cuba, and a translation of a proclamation of the Spanish military commander at Nuevitas contained in that paper. I ask that the papers may be referred to the committee, and I call their attention to them so that they may receive consideration along with those resolutions.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

ANNEXATION OF HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I present a paper prepared by ex-Senator Dubois on the subject of the annexation of Hawaii. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and printed as a document.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2807) granting a pension to Benjamin L. Nolan, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS.

Mr. LODGE, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the following concurrent resolution, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed of the report of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, in addition to the usual number, 500 copies of the report proper, 500 copies of the report of the assistant inspector-general on the State Homes, and 150 copies of the record of members, for the use of the Home.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2612) prohibiting the killing of fur seals in the waters of the North Pacific Ocean.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 5173) authorizing the Secretary of War, in his discretion, to purchase subsistence stores, supplies, and materials for the relief of people who are in the Yukon River country, to provide means for their transportation and distribution, and making an appropriation therefor; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

RELIEF OF SUFFERERS IN THE VALLEY OF THE YUKON.

Mr. HAWLEY. Do I understand that the bill relating to the relief of the Klondike people has come from the House?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is an original House bill on the same subject.

Mr. HAWLEY. So I understand, and I inquired if the bill has come from the House. The House has passed a bill on the same subject. The committees met in session at the same hour; the two Houses were in discussion of the question at the same hour, and each passed a bill. The House bill has amendments of the original which I think we ought to adopt, and the Senate bill has some which I think they ought to agree to. In order that a committee of conference may consider the question, I ask for the consideration of the bill now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the bill from the House of Representatives.

The bill (H. R. 5173) authorizing the Secretary of War, in his discretion, to purchase subsistence stores, supplies, and materials for the relief of people who are in the Yukon River country, to provide means for their transportation and distribution, and making an appropriation therefor, was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $175,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended, in the discretion and under the direction of the Secretary of War, for the purchase of subsistence stores, supplies, and materials for the relief of people who are in the Yukon River country or other mining regions of Alaska, and to purchase transportation and provide means for the distribution of such stores and supplies.

That the said subsistence stores, supplies, and materials may be sold in said country, at such prices as shall be fixed by the Secretary of War, or donated where he finds people in need and unable to pay for them.

That the Secretary of War may, in his discretion, purchase and import reindeer and employ and bring into the country reindeer drivers or herders not citizens of the United States, or provide any other means of transportation as in his judgment he may deem practicable. The said reindeer or other outfit may be sold and disposed of by the Secretary of War when he shall have no further use for them under the provisions of this act, or he may turn over the same or any part thereof to the Department of the Interior, and the proceeds arising from all sales herein authorized shall be covered into the Treasury.

The Secretary of War shall make report, in detail, to Congress, at the beginning of its next regular session, as to all purchases, employments, sales and donations, or transfers made under the provisions of this act.

Mr. HALE rose.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. HALE. I rose only for a question. Does the bill materially differ from the Senate bill? If it does not, I suggest to the Senator as a matter of expedition that he will more readily get the bill passed and to the President for his signature before the holiday adjournment if the Senate passes this bill. I do not know whether it does differ materially from the Senate bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think there are material differences. I conferred with the members of the House who have had this matter in charge and we have arranged for a speedy conference between the two Houses in regard to the differences. I move to strike out all after the enacting clause and substitute the Senate bill. It is our hope to get the bill into conference and finish it to-day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut moves to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert what will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

That the sum of $250,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended (or so much thereof as may be necessary), in the discretion and under the direction of the Secretary of War, for the purchase of subsistence stores, supplies, and material for the relief of people who are in the Yukon River country, or other mining regions of Alaska, and to purchase transportation and provide means for the distribution of such stores and supplies, and such other supplies as may be contributed by the citizens of Oregon and others: Provided, That, with the consent of the Canadian Government first obtained, the Secretary of War may cause the relief herein provided for to be extended into Canadian territory.

SEC. 2. That the said subsistence stores, supplies, and materials may be sold in said country at such prices as shall be fixed by the Secretary of War, or donated, where he finds people in need and unable to pay for the same.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of War may, in his discretion, purchase and import reindeer and employ and bring into the country reindeer drivers or herders not citizens of the United States, or provide such other means of transportation as in his judgment he may deem practicable. The said reindeer or other outfit may be sold and disposed of by the Secretary of War when he shall have no further use for them under the provision of this act, and the proceeds arising from all sales herein authorized shall be covered into the Treasury.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. HAWLEY, Mr. CARTER, and Mr. COCKRELL were appointed.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] yesterday made a very grave charge against me—I regard it as a grave charge. He accused me of having misrepresented the attitude of the Administration on the money question. I argued that the Administration was in favor of perpetuating the single gold standard in this country without regard to the action of other countries. I thought, and I stated at the time, that there was abundant documentary evidence to prove my position. The Senator from New Hampshire questioned that seriously, and he questioned it particularly with regard to the attitude of the Secretary of the Treasury, the organ and spokesman of the Administration on financial matters.

During the time that that controversy was going on here, or a few minutes preceding it, the Secretary of the Treasury distinctly defined the position of the Administration upon that question in his statement to the Committee on Banking and Currency of the other House. He spoke from prepared slips, and his language upon that point is so accurate and unmistakable that I think it relieves me of the charge of having misrepresented him in that regard. I will ask the Secretary to read what I have marked from the report of what occurred before the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House of Representatives yesterday.

Mr. CHANDLER. From what paper does the Senator take the statement?

Mr. STEWART. From the Evening Star of yesterday, Thursday, December 16.

The Secretary read as follows:

Secretary Gage appeared to-day before the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House of Representatives to present a bill embodying his views for a revision of the currency, to explain and urge its provisions, and to meet any objections raised by the committee. The Secretary was accompanied by Judge O'Connell, Solicitor of the Treasury. Copies of the Secretary's bill were handed to members of the committee and were scanned with great interest. After being introduced to the various gentlemen of the committee, Mr. Gage began his statement, speaking in an easy, conversational manner, and following notes. He said in opening:

"The objects I have in mind in the series of provisions offered by me are four in number:

"First. To commit the country more thoroughly to the gold standard, remove, so far as possible, doubts and fears on that point, and thus strengthen the credit of the United States both at home and abroad.

"Second. To strengthen the Treasury in relation to its demand liabilities, in which are included greenbacks, Treasury notes, and the incidental obligation to maintain on a parity, through interchangeability with gold, so far as may be necessary, the present large volume of silver certificates and silver dollars.

"Third. To do this in such a way as not to contract the volume of circulation in the hands of the people.

"Fourth. To take an initial step toward a system of bank-note issues without the conditional deposit of public bonds as security therefor. If we prosper as a people, the revenue of the Government ought to be somewhat in advance of its expenditures and the public debt of the United States gradually reduced and finally extinguished. Looking at the question widely, from my best point of knowledge and experience, I feel that if these could be secured, the condition of the Government in its relation to the currency would be much safer and stronger than now, and that through the operation of national-bank-note currency the commercial and industrial interests of the United States would be greatly advantaged."

Mr. STEWART. The Secretary of the Treasury states distinctly that the first and paramount object of all his schemes, writings, and bills is to commit the country more fully to the gold standard, to get rid of Government money, and rely upon gold circulation and bank currency. Furthermore, he anticipates reaching a point when the banks will not be required to put up any security for their circulation, because in his various interviews he has declared it a waste of capital, contending that they ought to be entitled to issue bank currency without security to the Government, and they are to issue, not their own money, but money donated to them by the United States. Mark the language; mark the proceedings from beginning to the end of all these schemes. They are not bank issues, but they are Government issues, donated to the banks by the Government and redeemed by the Government.

Mr. Gage proposes to reach a point when Government money shall be given to the banks without the deposit of bonds and by them loaned to the people. In addition to committing the Administration to the single gold standard and measures to perpetuate it, he is also endeavoring to commit the country to a system of bank currency, so called, which is in fact Government currency to be redeemed by the Government, for which the banks give no security and no consideration. If the country is to move on those lines, if that is to be the policy, the issue is made, and we accept the issue between the Administration as made by the Secretary of the Treasury and the people of the United States, who have to foot the bill.

ALCOHOL USED IN THE ARTS.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The joint select committee, consisting of three members of the Senate and three members of the House, who were appointed to consider the question as to whether alcohol used in manufactures and the arts should be taxed, present their report, together with the testimony which has been taken. I ask that the report lie on the table, and that the report and testimony be printed.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to give notice, in this connection, that I shall take an early and convenient time to call the attention of the Senate, with some emphasis, to the difference between the mode of treatment in our legislation of the men who produce whisky for consumption as a beverage and the men who use alcohol for the harmless and beneficent processes of manufacture or in the arts; and also, to the great difference in the behavior of our legislators, of all parties, toward the manufacturers of beer and this class of citizens. Everybody seems to be afraid of a brewer, and everybody seems to be afraid of whisky distillers in our legislation. I think, probably, it is about time we should put a little more justice and a little more courage into all our dealings with these subjects.

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish to ask the Senator from Connecticut, the chairman of the joint committee on the part of the Senate, whether the committee has reported any bill for exempting alcohol used in the arts from the present internal-revenue tax?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The joint committee, as was suggested at the time I made the report, consists of six members, three members of the Senate and three of the House. The committee has been unable to agree except upon one proposition, which proposition is that we can not at the present time, under existing circumstances, legislate for the removal of the tax upon alcohol used in manufactures and the arts. Upon the question whether it ought to be done under other circumstances when the revenues of the Government shall permit, the committee was unable to come to any agreement by a majority. The members have expressed their separate views upon that subject. Of course no bill has been formulated or presented with the report. I may say, perhaps, that for myself I am decidedly of the opinion that whenever it can be done under the condition of our revenues alcohol used in manufactures and the arts ought to be relieved from the burden of its present exorbitant taxation.

Mr. GRAY. May I ask the Senator from Connecticut a question?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. In one moment, please. I have, in connection with another member of the committee, in the views which I have submitted, discussed somewhat at length what I think a bill might and should be. I think that answers the question.

Mr. CHANDLER. Before the Senator from Delaware——

Mr. GRAY. May I ask the Senator from Connecticut a single question?

Mr. CHANDLER. I want to ask a question myself, but I will yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. GRAY. Has the Senator from New Hampshire the floor? I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut, with the permission of the Senator from New Hampshire——

Mr. CHANDLER. I will yield to the Senator from Delaware.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire yields to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. GRAY. I ask the Senator from Connecticut whether his committee has considered what relief might come to the industrial users of alcohol, or alcohol used in the arts, as the phrase is, as well as to the Treasury of the United States, if we were to reduce the tax on distilled spirits from its present high altitude to what the Secretary of the Treasury in his report has called the revenue point of about 70 cents a gallon instead of $1.10, thereby reaching, as he thinks, a point which would produce more revenue to the Treasury and be a very measurable relief of the burden now resting upon those who use alcohol in the arts?

Mr. CHANDLER. Before the Senator from Connecticut answers that I should like to ask him my question and let him answer both questions at the same time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish to have the Senator from Connecticut state what the rate of taxation is under existing law upon grain alcohol. What is the percentage of taxation to the cost of producing a gallon of grain alcohol?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It is stated in the views which I have had the honor to submit at about 1,300 per cent.

Mr. TELLER. How much?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Thirteen hundred per cent on the cost of the alcohol.

Replying to the question of the Senator from Delaware, I will say that one member of the committee, in the views which he submits, recommends the reduction of the tax to a revenue point in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury. I am not sure that he states what he thinks the revenue point is. For myself, in the views which I submit, in which one member of the House concurs with me, I have not dealt with that subject. I did not feel that that came within the province of the committee. I understood that we were to inquire whether alcohol used in manufactures and arts in legitimate and beneficent industries and not for use as a beverage ought to be subjected to taxation or not. I have dealt only with that subject.

Of course, in what I think is a great wrong committed, the wrong might not be as great if the tax were less. The present tax is $1.10 a gallon for proof spirits. It was testified before the committee that proof alcohol is worth 8½ cents a gallon, and it is taxed $1.10. Of course it might be a little less injustice if the tax were 90 cents or 70 cents, but, speaking for myself, I do not think that would meet the question at all.

Mr. CHANDLER. I merely wish to say that I think the Senator from Connecticut and the member of the House of Representatives associated with him ought to have ventured to report a bill. It must be apparent to Senators that if we tax alcohol used in the arts in this country 1,300 per cent the manufacturers who use alcohol are at an enormous disadvantage in competing with foreign manufacturers who make similar articles with free alcohol. In order properly to protect the manufacturers who use alcohol in the arts taxed 1,300 per cent we must put an enormous customs duty upon articles into which the manufacture of alcohol enters. I suppose the Senator from Connecticut will agree to that. Some of the Senators and Representatives who are the most opposed to adequate customs duties are in favor of retaining, without making any exception in the case of alcohol used in useful arts, the present high rate of internal-revenue taxation upon alcohol.

Mr. President, it seems to me that the remedy should be applied now to this evil of legislation, by which not only alcohol used as a pernicious beverage is taxed 1,300 per cent, but grain alcohol used for a useful purpose in the arts has the same enormous taxation placed upon it. I say the remedy should be applied now without waiting for the good time to come, which we all very well understand will be never.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do not understand that the Senator from New Hampshire makes the suggestion that we should have reported a bill in the way of criticism at all. If he does, I have simply to say that the life and power of this committee expires by legislation to-day, and that there has not been time to prepare a bill as carefully framed with regard to details as such a bill should be. I have outlined the general principles upon which I think such a bill should be framed.

I desire to say to the Senator from New Hampshire that I have not given up this subject, but that I intend to continue my interest in it, and, if possible, to prepare and perfect a bill. To do that I feel that I shall be obliged to consult with people having expert knowledge of the administration of our internal-revenue laws and also with people having expert knowledge as to the present legitimate, beneficent uses of alcohol in manufactures and the arts. I hope at some future time to be able to present the bill.

Mr. HALE. I suppose there would be another great and apparent advantage if the bill which the Senator from New Hampshire desires should be reported by the committee and passed. It would decrease the revenues of the Government. Would not that be the undoubted effect of the passage of such a bill?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It probably would decrease the revenue of the Government about $10,000,000, to speak in round numbers.

Mr. HALE. That, I suppose, is one of the advantages that the Senator from New Hampshire seeks in desiring to have such a bill reported—that the revenues of the Government shall be further diminished $10,000,000.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Maine is apparently sincere in what he says, as he usually is. In view of the great difficulty we have experienced in making any advance in the direction which the Senator from Connecticut wishes to legislate on this subject, there having been a positive declaration of law inserted in the Wilson bill upon the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] exempting alcohol used in the arts from any internal-revenue tax, which has been repealed by Congress, it occurred to me that whenever the beneficent time arrives when, in the opinion of the Senators in charge of the finances of the Government and the appropriations of the Government, it might be appropriate to give this relief it would be wise to have a bill pending for consideration in the Senate. It need not be passed immediately. It need not be passed until the blissful day when the revenues under the existing laws do equal the expenditures. But if any such bill is ever to pass, I submit that a commission having been appointed by statute to investigate this subject, and two members of it having reached a conclusion that there ought to be a remedy for existing evils, they should have reported a bill for the consideration of the Senate, to be passed at the appropriate time.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] speaks with some sarcasm of the suggestion to do justice to this class of manufacturers because of the possibility of a diminution of the revenues of the Government. I will state the exact condition of things. Here is not only a harmless, but an innocent and most beneficent class of manufacturers engaged in an extensive foreign and domestic business likely to be driven out of their foreign business—at any rate, to have it largely curtailed—by reason of the fact that alone almost of the manufacturing industries of this country, with very few exceptions, they are taxed 1,300 per cent on their material.

I think when we confront that condition of things, we are entitled to have some other reasons than a statement that we want the money. That tax was kept up after Congress had in substance voted it out of the legislation of the country, and it is kept up at a time when you let the distillers of whisky get, at the expense of the Government, an enormous profit, amounting, I think, to more than 100 per cent (I have not the figures now in my desk) by reason of your arrangements with reference to bonded warehouses.

I should think the Senator from Maine might consider something about the desirableness of revenue when he is dealing with the matter of beer. Here are a number of foreign brewers. They have a method of making a most deleterious and injurious class of beer without hops. They started it in foreign countries. Those governments, jealous and anxious for the health of their people and the purity of their national beverages, put a stop to the deleterious practice; and they have come over here. They are buying up the American breweries with foreign capital. I know in one instance of a brewer of foreign birth making 175,000 barrels of beer a year and making a profit of a dollar a barrel on his manufacture. We do not dare to compel that industry to pay a reasonable and proper tax, because we are afraid of the political power the brewers will exert, determining the political power in this country between different political parties. An additional tax of a dollar a barrel or half a dollar a barrel on beer would remove all the financial trouble in the matter of deficit. I think there is a good chance for a little sarcasm from my honorable friend and neighbor from Maine on that subject. I wish he would devote his genius and intellect to that simple proposition.

Mr. President, I think we had better face it. If we would face that music without either side of the Chamber intending to make political capital of it, we could solve the difficulty of our deficit and our financial troubles in half an hour.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, it is a notorious fact that Congress never did deliberately enact that portion of the tariff law (known as the Wilson law) to which the Senator from Massachusetts refers with the intention that it should remain upon the statute book of the country. That portion of the law was placed in it with the understanding that it would go out in conference. It was put there at a time when those of us in charge of the bill upon this side of the Chamber were reduced to dire extremity in order to get a vote upon the measure at all. It was introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts, who appealed to my colleague, Senator JONES of Arkansas, and myself to allow that portion of the bill to be passed without debate in order that it might be considered in the conference committee.

Mr. HOAR. My honorable friends will not say that I appealed to them that it should be considered without debate. My honorable friend, I think, will not adhere, on reflection, to his statement that my appeal was that it should be considered without debate.

Mr. VEST. I do not mean to say, probably, without debate, but we were appealed to to allow it to go in the bill without opposition upon our part on the floor, in order that it might be considered in conference and acted upon. I think the Senator from Massachusetts will agree to that statement.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, not exactly. No doubt the Senator states it as he understands it. My proposition was that it should go in as a matter of justice and of right. Nobody that I ever yet heard questioned the justice and propriety of that measure. The only question was whether it was practicable to have an arrangement which would secure the freedom from tax of alcohol used in the arts without giving rise to fraud upon the revenue in regard to alcohol used as a beverage, and my suggestion was that if the conference committee on full examination by experts came to the conclusion that that was impossible, I would not then press the retention of the clause. Now, instead of the conference committee doing that, the majority of the House were compelled to take a different course by what they conceived to be good political reasons—good reasons; I will not use the word "political"—and they at the last moment took the entire bill as passed by he Senate without any consideration of the details and without reference to the question whether the details were just or unjust. So the condition upon the occurrence of which I was willing to desist from pressing the measure at that time, to wit, a full and thorough examination of the question of practicability, never existed.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, the RECORD will show exactly what occurred, I think. I have it not before me, but I have a very distinct recollection as to what passed between the Senator from Massachusetts and my colleague on the committee, Mr. JONES of Arkansas, and myself. It is true that the conference committee never reported, and therefore that crude, immature provision was left in the bill and went upon the statute book. For myself, I can distinctly state that I never would have consented to it in the shape in which it stood except for the fact that I supposed it could be arranged in committee, and I never contemplated the idea that it would be enacted at all.

The Senator from Massachusetts has stated the crucial point in this whole business, and that is whether we can remove the duty upon wood alcohol without impairing the revenues of the Government received upon grain alcohol.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. There is no duty or tax upon wood alcohol.

Mr. VEST. There is not now.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. There is not now and never has been. The question is whether we can remove the tax upon grain alcohol used in the arts without danger of fraud upon the revenue.

Mr. VEST. It is substantially the same thing, because it is proposed to use alcohol in the arts free of tax, and the proposition which was in the Wilson bill was to take off the tax on alcohol used in the arts, and that is wood alcohol. Wood alcohol is used in the arts because it is cheaper, and it is better, I understand, for mechanical purposes. The statement I made and the statement of the Senator from Connecticut are substantially the same. The trouble is the removal afterwards of alcohol from the wood alcohol used in the arts, and I spoke of wood alcohol because it is the sort which is used in the arts.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. As I have understood this matter from the beginning, the question was only whether the internal-revenue tax, now a dollar and ten cents a gallon, on grain alcohol or any alcohol which comes under the head of distilled spirits should be removed when that alcohol was used in the manufactures and the arts.

Mr. VEST. That is right.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. When used for purposes other than as a beverage.

Mr. VEST. That is right.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Wood alcohol has never had any tax upon it. That is one of the things which is discussed in this report. It is used as a substitute for grain alcohol in certain industries. It is not so good, but it is used on account of the high price of grain alcohol, which has to pay the internal-revenue tax. There are still used, I suppose, something like 9,000,000 gallons of grain alcohol in legitimate beneficial industries. Wood alcohol, the production of which is about 2,000,000 gallons, has been substituted to that extent for grain alcohol, which would otherwise be used. Wood alcohol has no tax upon it and never has had.

Mr. VEST. That is very true; and yet the question with the Internal Revenue Department has always been whether if the tax upon alcohol used in the arts should be removed, it would not result in impairing the revenue derived from grain alcohol. Under the first Administration of Mr. Cleveland I remember very distinctly that Mr. Wilson, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, put up a miniature distillery in the Internal Revenue Bureau and experimented in the manufacture of wood alcohol, and then as to the question whether from wood alcohol could be taken the essential element of alcohol and used afterwards for a beverage.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. By mixing them.

Mr. VEST. Yes, by mixing them, as my friend from Arkansas says. It was the opinion of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, as he repeatedly said, and as will be found in his reports to Congress, that it could not be done. Therefore the great question has always been whether the contention of these manufacturers should be acceded to, or whether they could use wood alcohol, and the revenue upon grain alcohol would not be diminished for that reason.

I should like to have the Senator from Connecticut go into another branch of this question, for I could not hear him distinctly when he was engaged in a colloquy with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER]. Will he state whether he agrees with the assertion of the Secretary of the Treasury that lessening the tax upon alcohol would increase the revenue?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. As one member of the joint select committee, I have not attempted to deal with that subject. I am not certain at all that a reduction of the present internal-revenue tax upon alcohol or distilled spirits to 70 cents or 90 cents a gallon would result in any increase of revenue or in providing a revenue equal to what is now derived from distilled spirits. I do not wish, however, to say that I am convinced that it would not. I think it is an open question. I am quite well convinced in my mind that the first effect of it would be a large reduction in revenue. If the tax were to be reduced from $1.10 to 70 cents, there would have to be withdrawn annually for consumption 20,000,000 gallons more of distilled spirits than are now withdrawn for consumption. In other words, the tax would have to be collected on 20,000,000 gallons more of distilled spirits than at present. I do not believe that for the first year or the second year the revenue would be equal to what it is now. Possibly as time went on the revenue might get back to the amount now collected. This is my own individual opinion about it. I have not attempted to deal with that question in the report.

Mr. VEST. That is an important consideration, Mr. President, because it enters into this question not only of decreasing the internal-revenue tax upon alcohol, but into the propriety of increasing the tax upon beer. I know of no reason why it should operate differently in the two cases. If the decrease of the duty upon alcohol would, as the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] seems to think, decrease the internal-revenue tax upon alcohol, then would the increase of the tax upon beer increase the amount of the revenue that is now received from beer?

I submit these remarks because these questions have been pending for a long time before the Finance Committee of the Senate and the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, and I have never heard of any solution of them that meets with the approval of all parties.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri a question based upon two facts: First, that it costs about 8 cents to make a gallon of grain alcohol and about 70 cents to make a gallon of wood alcohol. Is it a wise revenue system that forces the use of the 70-cent alcohol when the 8-cent alcohol would accomplish the same result? That is the working of the present system.

Mr. VEST. There, again, Mr. President, we are confronted with the question raised by the Internal Revenue Bureau at all times, whether this proposed legislation as to exempting alcohol used in the arts would not destroy the whole internal-revenue tax upon alcohol, not only that used in the arts, but on that used for a beverage.

Mr. HALE. The subcommittee that was directed by statute to consider the treatment that should be visited by Congress upon the manufacturers of alcohol to be used in the arts have given very careful attention undoubtedly to the subject-matter, and, in his usually direct manner, the Senator in charge presented the report this morning. Everybody can see from what he said that, while inclined, perhaps, to believe that some legislation at some time might be necessary for the relief of this interest, the Senator was confronted with the essential condition that the revenues are less than the expenditures, and therefore did not believe that now was the fitting time to further reduce our revenues. When, after that, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] made what occurred to me as a sham fight on this subject and proceeded to prod the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], and asked him why he had not reported the bill for the relief of those manufacturers, if I indulged in anything that seemed to be sarcasm to the Senator from Massachusetts or the Senator from New Hampshire, it was because I did not believe that the fight they were making was a real fight. I did not suppose that anybody believed that now we could report, consider, and pass a bill further reducing the revenues of the Government.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. HALE. I sympathize with the Senator from Massachusetts, because I have constituents engaged in this manufacture, and they are worthy men. They rest under a burden. I sympathize fully with the Senator in that, and would like to see them relieved. I sympathize fully with the Senator in his suggestion——

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. HALE. In a moment.

With reference to the beer interest, it would have been wiser and better, I think, if beer had been taxed a dollar a barrel, so as to increase our revenues. But even the burdens that the Senator's constituents who are engaged in the manufacture of alcohol in the beneficent arts are laboring under will not justify us, until we can see our way to get revenue somewhere, in reducing the revenue $10,000,000 for any purpose.

What the Senator calls—and what he deprecates and perhaps finds fault with—my sarcasm was based simply upon that condition, that I did not believe that anybody expected the Senator from Connecticut to go further than this. I do not know what the Senator from Connecticut will do or what the Senator from Massachusetts or the Senator from New Hampshire will do.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Massachusetts will ask a question.

Mr. HALE. Yes; but I suppose, Mr. President, that the time at which I will yield for a question, although it seems to the Senator from Massachusetts to be in his discretion, is in my discretion. I thought so, at least; but I shall yield to the Senator in a moment.

Mr. HOAR. Pardon me.

Mr. HALE. I do not know but what the Senator from New Hampshire will move to further extend the time of this committee in order to give them an opportunity to bring in a bill to further reduce the revenue, but I do not think that any measure of that kind will receive favorable consideration until we get more revenue. Now I will yield, with the leave of the Senator from Massachusetts, to him for a question.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to ask the Senator from Maine what it was I said which, in his judgment, warranted the statement which he has made, that I proceeded to prod or criticise or find fault with the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will allow me to add, it is absolutely and unqualifiedly a statement made out of the whole cloth, and never came from my lips.

Mr. HALE. There is not much of a question between the Senator from Massachusetts and me as to what he had in his mind when he termed my remarks as sarcasm, as if I were disregarding the actual and real interests of honest people engaged in a beneficent manufacture, and was seeking to put them down by sarcasm. Whether that would be called finding fault is a question not of issue between him and me, but whether the phrase could be applied that the Senator deemed what I said sarcasm, and unjustifiable sarcasm——

Mr. HOAR. That is not what I spoke of in my question.

Mr. HALE. What I said was undoubtedly true, but I was not sensitive about it, and am not sensitive now in the least about it, and there is no issue between the Senator and me.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, the Senator from Maine stated that I proceeded to prod the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. HALE. I referred more especially to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER].

Mr. HOAR. I ask the Senator what I had said that warranted such a statement as that from him, and he proceeded, first, to say that something I said about his sarcasm warranted him.

Mr. HALE. What the Senator had termed my sarcasm.

Mr. HOAR. What I had termed the Senator's sarcasm.

Mr. HALE. I was quite earnest.

Mr. HOAR. I am talking about the Senator from Connecticut, for whose attitude in this matter I have the profoundest respect. I am not, by the Senator from Maine, to be put in a position when I criticise him of having criticised the Senator from Connecticut. They are different Senators; their positions are different, and their way of looking at this subject is different.

Mr. President, what I said I will repeat in one moment. I simply rose and observed that I should take an opportunity at some proper time to point out the difference in regard to the matter of just treatment, of the policy which has been adopted in our recent legislation in dealing with the manufacturers who use alcohol in the arts and in dealing with the manufacturers of whisky who sell it for a beverage, and I added, what I religiously believe, that the whole matter of our revenue difficulties could be settled if both parties in this country would unite in not being afraid of the brewers, to put a proper, reasonable tax upon beer. Then the Senator asked, with what I thought was intended for sarcasm—the Senator thinks he did not succeed in being sarcastic, and I will agree with him in that particular——

Mr. HALE. I think I did succeed, from what I have heard since.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator asked, with great sarcasm, "Where are you going to get your revenue?" I say, get it by letting the bonded-warehouse system, as applied to whisky, operate for the benefit of the Government and not for the benefit of the distillers, and get it by a tax of a dollar a barrel on the brewers. You will thus get all the revenue you want. That is my answer to the Senator's question.

Mr. HALE. I will agree to what the Senator says, if he will allow me——

Mr. HOAR. I understand the Senator says he agrees with me.

Mr. HALE. I shall agree as to the brewers; but I still insist that nobody here seriously believes that the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from New Hampshire will get this subcommittee of the Committee on Finance or a joint committee or a commission, however desirable it may be to get an increased tax from the beer manufacturers, to report any measure that will reduce our revenues $10,000,000 until we see the other revenues in sight. I do not ask how we can get it. I think I can see how we can get it. We can get it from beer, but whether we will get it from beer I do not know; and until we are certain to get it I am not in favor of reducing the revenue any $10,000,000 to favor any interest, however beneficent.

Mr. HOAR. I simply desire to ask the Senator from Maine what he finds in anything I have said that is inconsistent with the Senator's own position?

Mr. HALE. The trouble with the Senator is that I have not paid so much attention to what he says as he has. I am not especially interested in what he says in the matter. My point is on a matter of great public interest. No ten, no twelve, no twenty Senators can get us to reduce the revenues until we see a way of increasing them in other directions.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator says that he misrepresents what I have said because he did not pay attention to it. That is what I supposed.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. President, I desire to introduce a bill for reference.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is not yet in order. Reports of committees are still in order. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] submitted a report, with the request that it be printed and laid upon the table. Is there any objection to the request?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I ask that the order to print may extend to the testimony taken by the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and that will be the order.

Mr. CHANDLER. I give notice that I shall reply to the Senator from Maine on some other occasion.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Mr. President, referring to what has just passed in the Senate between the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], my impression was that what was stated by the Senator from Massachusetts at the time that the provision as to free alcohol went into the bill was even stronger than stated by the Senator from Missouri. I have no recollection of any statement being made by the Senator from Massachusetts that he proposed that this question should go to the committee of conference, and that, after an examination by experts, he would be willing that some action should be taken. I have sent for the RECORD, and I read what the Senator said on that occasion:

Mr. HOAR. If the Senators having charge of the bill are willing to let the amendment go in, so that the subject will be in their power, I will say for one that I shall not only not oppose it, but I shall support them in striking it out and make no complaint if, either on consulting with the authorities of the Treasury or on further consideration themselves, they find that it is not practical.

Mr. HOAR. That is what I think.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Then this follows in the RECORD:

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I have no objection to that.

With the distinct understanding on this side of the Chamber that the only purpose of putting this proposition in the bill was to allow the conference committee to consider it, and that they had full authority to get rid of it, I consented that it might go into the bill. My colleague from Missouri [Mr. VEST] and I never would have consented to it going into the bill under any other circumstances, and yet after an examination was made, and after it was reported by the Secretary of the Treasury that it was impossible to frame regulations which would make this clause operative, an effort was made to repeal the clause and avoid the numberless claims that would arise hereafter as against the Government for a failure to execute this provision of law. An effort which was made to repeal this clause was defeated, and this agreement, as we understood, and as was distinctly understood between the Senators on the other side of the Chamber and on this, was not carried out.

Mr. HOAR. I hope the Senator will pardon me one moment. The Senator's own statement, if he will consider it carefully, is all that I want. I agree that I said at the time not only publicly, but privately, and to members of the committee, that if this provision went into the bill, if they examined the question in conference properly and found that it was impracticable, I should not further insist upon it; but I never agreed that if the House of Representatives, for the sake of a political advantage, accepted the whole bill and it became a law without any consideration by that committee, I would consent to the repeal of the law in later years; and certainly the conditions on which I rested my suggestion have never existed.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. HOAR. The Department never has given a hearing to the experts. The committee of conference never met, did they?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. There was never a full meeting of the conferees.

Mr. HOAR. Was there ever a meeting of that committee of conference?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. There was one regular meeting, at which there was no time to take up the bill.

Mr. HOAR. Did the committee ever consider this question in conference?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. No, sir; they did not in conference.

Mr. HOAR. Nor did they ever have a hearing.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. HOAR. Mr. Secretary Boutwell, formerly Commissioner of Internal Revenue and afterwards Secretary of the Treasury, declared publicly and repeatedly that he had investigated the subject and that, in his judgment, there was no difficulty in accomplishing what everybody conceived to be just if it could be accomplished, and that is his opinion to-day. All that I demand in behalf of the manufacturers who are taxed a matter of 1,100 or 1,200 per cent is that there shall be a living up to the precise understanding which the Senator has read, to wit, that there shall be an investigation by some competent authority—by the authority which has to deal with the subject—and that, if they find it practicable—and I will undertake that they shall be furnished with a practical method of accomplishing it—then those manufacturers shall be relieved. Instead of that, we have not only affirmed for the benefit of the distillers of Kentucky and the brewers of the country this unjust, enormous taxation, but we have refused to make provision for what is their clear right under the existing law—the refunding of the tax erroneously assessed upon them.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. But I insist upon again calling the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to his own words. What he stated, as shown by the RECORD, is not that this question should be considered by a conference committee on the part of the House, but the Senator said:

Mr. HOAR. If the Senators having charge of the bill are willing to let the amendment go in, so that the subject will be in their power, I will say for one that I shall not only not oppose it, but I shall support them in striking it out and make no complaint if, either on consulting with the authorities of the Treasury, or on further consideration themselves, they find that it is not practical.

Mr. HOAR. Of course, the Senator understands——

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. So it was left with the Senators having charge of that bill; and it is well known who were the Senators having charge of the bill. There was no proposition from the Senator that the question should be determined by a conference committee or by a board of experts; it was simply a matter left to the Senators having charge of the bill. If they were satisfied, after consultation with the Treasury Department or upon further examination themselves, then the Senator pledged himself to help to repeal the law.

Mr. HOAR. No, I did not, Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me. He can find nothing of the kind there. I consented to its being stricken out of that bill.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. That is what I mean, striking it out.

Mr. HOAR. I did not say if the provision became a law it should be in the power of two or three Senators in future years to have it repealed. I suppose, and of course the Senator supposed, that the determination on the part of himself and his associates in charge of the bill would be on the hearing of parties and the consideration of the subject in an official and not in a private way. Does the Senator claim, when I said if Senators put into a particular measure a clause, that if they became satisfied afterwards that it should be stricken out before the bill went through, that involved a pledge on my part that they were to be the masters of the subject for all future years, and that that bill was to be repealed whenever they said so? The Senator voted for that clause and voted to make it a part of the law. He submitted to it because he knew his bill would be defeated in the existing political conditions if he did not. I certainly never understood for a moment, and I do not think the Senator from Arkansas or any other Senator will claim that he understood for a moment, that I said that if thereafter, in five years, or three years, or two years, any particular Senator wanted to repeal this law, I should submit to it. I was speaking of the conduct of that bill, and that alone.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there are no further reports of committees, the introduction of bills is in order.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, before this subject passes from the Senate, I desire to say a word or two respecting it. The question which has just been reported upon by the joint select committee is, we all agree, of very great importance. For one, I consented that the committee should be raised, in order that we might have a thorough examination of the question as to whether it is practicable under our existing system to exempt from taxation alcohol used in the arts.

This is not a new question. It has been before the Senate and before the two bodies for many years. As the result of every investigation, so far as I have known up to this time—I do not know what the present committee has reported—it has been disclosed that it is an impracticable thing to exempt alcohol in the arts without impairing very greatly the revenue to be derived from distilled spirits.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will ask whether the Senator himself has not reported to the Senate and advocated provisions for exempting from taxation alcohol used in the arts, and whether he does not know that it is the practice of foreign countries to exempt alcohol used in the arts?

Mr. ALLISON. I will of course answer the Senator's question. I do not wish to discuss by and large this whole question.

In 1888, when the Mills bill, so called, came over to the Senate, the Committee on Finance did enter into an elaborate examination of the whole question and reported to the Senate a scheme. It never had my full support, because I doubted always whether it was a practicable scheme; but we reported it and it passed the Senate. It never passed the two Houses.

Such exemption is provided for in other countries, and it may be that it can be provided for here. If it can be, I certainly should support it; and therefore I was in favor of the committee making a thorough examination and calling to their aid all the experts possible, not only in this country, but in other countries.

Now, I do not know what the testimony discloses or what the committee's report is, but certainly we have no jurisdiction here now to discuss the question whether or not alcohol used in the arts shall be exempt from taxation, or whether the tax shall be reduced from $1.10 a gallon to 70 cents a gallon. That is a question which must originate in the House of Representatives and can not be considered here.

But I wish to say one word to the Senator from New Hampshire, who criticised our action respecting the taxing of distilled spirits, because we have taxed those spirits 1,300 per cent, assuming the cost to be 8½ cents per gallon. We have carefully, at least as carefully as it is possible, protected our manufacturers who use alcohol in the arts by placing upon foreign spirits imported into our country a duty of double the amount that is imposed by the internal-revenue law. The spirits that are used chiefly in the arts are employed by those who must have pure spirits, distilled from grain. We have also extended the most liberal provisions whereby they can use our domestic spirits in bond and export the manufactured articles without the payment of the tax.

Mr. President, I desire to say here that although I have expressed the opinion on one or two occasions, perhaps last year, that the tax on distilled spirits was higher than it ought to be for revenue purposes, I have modified my views upon the subject because of the experience of the last year and a half. It is disclosed by the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, which is not yet printed, that during the last year we increased the revenue from distilled spirits from grain nearly $2,000,000, and I am told that for the first quarter of this year there has been a larger proportionate increase, showing that the apprehension, which was stated by the Secretary of the Treasury last year, has failed thus far to prove true, and that the probability is that the tax of $1.10 a gallon can be collected. I submit that if it can be collected it ought to be collected, at least until our revenues equal our expenditures.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa one question, if it is convenient to him.

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. Is he not of opinion that, if the tax on alcohol used in the arts can be removed altogether or greatly reduced, justice requires that it shall be done, if it can be done without frauds on the revenues in regard to other distilled spirits? Is not that his opinion?

Mr. ALLISON. I will answer the Senator from Massachusetts in this way: I should be perfectly willing to exempt distilled spirits from taxation when used in the arts, provided we can get revenue from other sources that will make up the revenue thus lost, and provided also that we shall, in the redistribution of the tax on distilled spirits, make a just distribution also of the duties upon imports that have been fixed with a view to the present tax upon distilled spirits.

It is manifestly impossible for us now to deal with this question in any way, and the only object that I or other Senators had, so far as I know, in raising the committee was to furnish to the Senate and to the country a body of information of which we were not in possession upon a greatly controverted point, as to whether it is possible, under our system of taxation of distilled spirits, to exempt spirits used in the arts from taxation without impairing or destroying the revenue derived from spirits used as a beverage. I for one am glad, therefore, that the committee have furnished this information and that they have stopped by saying that, whatever may be the differences of opinion, it is wholly impracticable to deal with it now.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, I do not wish to prolong this discussion, which has come up in a somewhat irregular way, but before the subject passes away I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire a single question, because I think he has given some attention to the matter of alcohol used in the arts. That is rather a vague phrase. What may be the arts in which, when alcohol is used, it shall be exempt from taxation may be a question. A friend near me suggests that the making of a cocktail is a very high branch of art, in which alcohol should be exempt.

But I was interested to hear the Senator from New Hampshire say that wood alcohol is superseding the use of alcohol made from grain, distilled spirits, in certain important arts, manufactures, and industries, and that there is no internal-revenue tax on wood alcohol. I did not know that. He also said that wood alcohol is considerably more expensive than alcohol obtained from grain. I should like to ask the Senator whether wood alcohol has superseded in the arts the use of alcohol obtained from grain? I ask for information entirely.

Mr. CHANDLER. I understand it has to a great extent. The case is a simple one, if the Senator will allow me to state it. We will say that it costs 10 cents a gallon to make grain alcohol, and that it is taxed $1.10, so that it will cost at least $1.20 a proof gallon to buy it and use it in the arts. Wood alcohol can be produced and sold for about 70 cents a gallon. Of course no one will pay $1.20 for alcohol for use in the arts if he can buy it for 70 cents. But if you will remove the internal-revenue tax upon alcohol used in the arts, the manufacturer will not pay 70 cents for wood alcohol when he can buy grain alcohol for 10 cents.

Mr. GRAY. I am much obliged for the information; and let me ask the Senator a further question. Would wood alcohol, if costing the same as alcohol obtained from grain, be preferred to alcohol from grain, or is the reverse true?

Mr. CHANDLER. Grain alcohol unquestionably would be preferred. The wood-alcohol industry is the creation entirely of the high tax on distilled spirits.

Mr. GRAY. If the Senator will indulge me with another question, I should like to ask one. I understand there are very important industries of a manufacturing kind in which alcohol is a very essential element of manufacture, but I wish to know whether there is not also, apart from mechanical manufacturing, a very large, and perhaps the largest, use of alcohol in the manufacture of proprietary medicines—what are sometimes called quack medicines?

Mr. CHANDLER. I can easily answer the Senator. There is a very large use of alcohol in proprietary medicines.

Mr. GRAY. Is it not the largest use of alcohol in the so-called arts?

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] can answer the question better than I can.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think not.

Mr. GRAY. I will state frankly to the Senator why I asked the question. There happened to fall under my eye quite accidentally the other day the report of the secretary of the board of health of the State of Massachusetts, which was printed and seemed to be an official publication in that State, in which there were a number of tables setting forth the extent to which alcohol was used in the manufacture of proprietary medicines. I think there was one table of at least a dozen of these so-called medicines in which the proportion of alcohol was found, upon analysis by the secretary, who seems to be the State chemist, too, to be very large. I am speaking entirely from memory, and I may be wrong, but relatively I am right. It seems that the proportion of alcohol in at least a dozen so-called bitters—I will not name them, because I might do an injustice to some of them, although I recall some of them—was nearly as large, within a fraction of 1 per cent as large, as it is in the best Kentucky whisky when ready for use as a beverage. If the proportion of alcohol in the best Kentucky whisky, when suitable for mixing and being consumed, is, say, 45 per cent—I do not recollect now what it is—then the proportion of alcohol in these so-called bitters ran up to somewhere near 40 or 42 per cent. That seemed to be a very astounding statement, and in the consideration of the matter of the exemption of alcohol used in the arts, I do not want it to be lost sight of, if it be true. It appears in this authoritative report of the secretary of the board of health.

Mr. LODGE. That is an official report.

Mr. GRAY. It is an official report.

Mr. LODGE. It was made by a State officer.

Mr. GRAY. And I suppose it is reliable.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator from Delaware will permit me, I will state that analyses have been made by chemists at various stages during the past ten or fifteen years, and the same result was reached. Some of the compounds contain as much alcohol as does whisky.

Mr. GRAY. I understand that the consumption, not the manfacture, of bitters of that kind is very enormous in the so-called prohibition States. Perhaps the Senator from Maine may have some experience in that regard. I understand they are sold at apothecary stores, and answer all the purposes that the best Kentucky whisky does, so far as the alcohol contained in them is concerned.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, I regret that upon the presentation of a report made by a committee, without an examination of it, a desultory discussion of this sort should spring up. The question is of too much importance to the country, to the revenue, and in every other respect to have it discussed except upon careful examination and knowledge of the facts as they exist. That is what I have endeavored to do from my standpoint in the report which I present.

Mr. CULLOM. Let us have it printed, so that we can read it.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It has been ordered to be printed. If this discussion shall have the effect to induce Senators to do what they seldom do, I fear—read what is submitted in the report and the testimony—it will not have been an unfortunate discussion.

But I wish to state right now and here, with reference to the suggestions which seem to be intimated by the Senator from Delaware, that no one has ever proposed to exempt from taxation alcohol which could be used in the making of beverages or in anything which could be used as beverages.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator will allow me to close the debate upon this important subject, which is not before the Senate, I will state that I do not think I was amenable to the discipline which the Senator from Maine undertook to administer. I am always pleased when he undertakes to admonish me how I shall perform my duties as a member of the Senate. I think my offense on this occasion was a slight one.

This report was made by the Senator from Connecticut in pursuance of the order of a statute of Congress. It was full and complete, interesting and important. The original statute which commanded the report to be made directed the committee to report by bill or otherwise. I merely inquired whether the members of the committee who believed that there should be legislation had reported a bill. Being informed that they had not reported a bill, I simply said I thought they ought to have done so. I did not say that with any disposition to criticise or condemn the Senator from Connecticut, but thereupon the Senator from Maine undertook to charge me with a purpose to reduce the revenues of the Government. That, he said, was the object of the Senator from New Hampshire. Mr. President, I did not think the Senator was sincere. If he was sincere, he only spoke in accordance with an amiable habit he has, to which all Senators must now and hereafter and continually, I suppose, submit.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask for the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The regular order is the introduction of bills.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. STEWART introduced a bill (S. 2873) authorizing the inhabitants of the town of Wadsworth, county of Washoe, State of Nevada, to acquire title under the statutes relating to town sites; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. DAVIS introduced a bill (S. 2874) granting a pension to George N. Morgan; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MASON introduced a bill (S. 2875) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to build an annex to the temporary post-office building situated in Chicago, Ill., and to expend the sum of $20,000 for such annex; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. MILLS introduced a bill (S. 2876) for the relief of John Mellifont and Ellen Riordon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 2877) to remove the charge of a dishonorable dismissal, after the battle of Stone River, standing against the name of Seth L. Woodworth, to correct the record, and issue him an honorable discharge; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PENROSE introduced a bill (S. 2878) for the relief of William Brice & Co. and others; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. McMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 2879) to vest in the Commissioners of the District of Columbia control of street parking in said District; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PRITCHARD introduced a bill (S. 2880) to raise the age of protection for girls in the District of Columbia to 18 years; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 2881) to authorize the Secretary of War to acquire the right of way for the Illinois and Mississippi Canal through the bridge owned by the city of Moline, in the county of Rock Island and State of Illinois, across Rock River in said county of Rock Island; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to state in connection with the bill that I am not sure it is in the right shape or form, but that it will naturally be referred to the Chief of Engineers, and the committee will make such changes as may be necessary.

I move that the bill and accompanying paper be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

EMPLOYEES IN LIBRARY OF CONGRESS.

Mr. THURSTON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Resolved, That the Librarian of the Library of Congress be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate a statement showing the names of all employees appointed by him to places in the Library, together with the States or Territories from which they were severally appointed; and also such information as may be in the possession of the Librarian as to any special library training or experience of such appointees prior to the time of appointment.

CONSIDERATION OF PENSION BILLS.

Mr. GALLINGER. At 3 o'clock the Senate is to take up a special order, and I ask unanimous consent that from the time the routine morning business is closed until 3 o'clock unobjected pension cases on the Calendar may be considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire? The Chair hears none, and that will be the order.

JUDICIAL AUTHORITY OF UNITED STATES MINISTER IN CHINA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State submitting for the required revision of Congress a decree proposed to be issued by the minister of the United States at Pekin under section 4086 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

WILLIAM McKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, December 16, 1897.

NORWEGIAN STEAMSHIP NICARAGUA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith, for such action as Congress may deem proper to take, a report from the Secretary of State and accompanying correspondence relating to the appeal for indemnity addressed to the equitable consideration of the Government of the United States by the owners and late master of the Norwegian steamship Nicaragua.

WILLIAM McKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, December 16, 1897.

(The inclosures are forwarded in the message to the House of Representatives.)

AMERICAN SOLDIERS KILLED AT BUENA VISTA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate of the United States:

Referring to my message of July 13 last, I transmit herewith, in response to the Senate resolution of June 3, 1897, addressed to the Secretary of State, a communication from that officer relative to the condition of the graves, near Saltillo, Mexico, of American soldiers killed at the battle of Buena Vista on February 27, 1847.

WILLIAM McKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, December 17, 1897.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT TACOMA, WASH.

Mr. WILSON. If it is in order, I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 347) providing for the erection of a public building in the city of Tacoma, in the State of Washington.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. GALLINGER. While this is not quite in accordance with the unanimous-consent agreement, I will not object to the consideration of the bill, but I hope the agreement will be carried out afterwards.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, in line 13, after the words "cost of," to strike out "four" and insert "two;" in the same line, after the word "hundred," to insert "and fifty;" in line 14, before the word "hundred," to strike out "four" and insert "two," and after the word "hundred," in the same line, to insert "and fifty;" so as to make the paragraph read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site for a building to be erected thereon, and to cause to be erected at the city of Tacoma, in the State of Washington, a suitable building for the use and accommodation of the United States courts, the post-office, and other Government offices in said city, with fireproof vaults extending to each story; the site and the building thereon, when completed according to plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, not to exceed the cost of $250,000; and the sum of $250,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purchase of said site and the completion of said building.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GALLINGER. A moment ago unanimous agreement was reached that after the routine morning business unobjected pension cases should be taken up until 3 o'clock. I desire to ask unanimous consent to modify that agreement by beginning at 2 o'clock, so that Senators can ask consideration for bills that they are interested in. I desire further to modify the agreement, at the request of a Senator, so that if the conference report on the Alaskan relief bill shall come in during the consideration of pension bills, the conference report may be considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the request made by the Senator from New Hampshire modifying his original proposition? The Chair hears none.

AMERICAN REGISTER FOR THE STEAMER JACKSONVILLE.

Mr. PASCO. I ask that the bill (S. 2394) to provide an American register for the steamer Jacksonville be taken up for consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, to strike out section 2, in the following words:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to cause the inspection of said vessel, steam boilers, steam pipes, and their appurtenances, and to cause to be granted the usual certificate issued to steam vessels of the merchant marine, without reference to the fact that said steam boilers, steam pipes, and appurtenances were not constructed pursuant to the laws of the United States, and were not constructed of iron stamped pursuant to said laws; and the tests in the inspection of said boilers, steam pipes, and appurtenances shall be the same in all respects as to strength and safety as are required in an inspection of boilers constructed in the United States for marine purposes.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Navigation is hereby authorized and directed to cause the foreign-built steamer Soledad, owned by the Hektograph Manufacturing Company, incorporated under the laws of the State of New York, to be registered as a vessel of the United States under the name of Jacksonville.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONGRESS OF INDIAN TRIBES AT OMAHA.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask unanimous consent to call up Senate bill 2507 to provide for the holding of a congress of the Indian tribes of the United States at the city of Omaha, in the State of Nebraska, in the year A. D. 1898, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator from Nebraska will not press that bill now. I should like to look into it.

Mr. ALLEN. I will not press it, of course, if the Senator desires to examine it. It is the matter which I laid on the Senator's desk some time ago.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator will let it pass over.

Mr. ALLEN. Let it be passed over.

INTERNATIONAL FISHERIES EXPOSITION AT BERGEN, NORWAY.

Mr. THURSTON. I ask leave to make a report from the Committee on International Expositions. I am directed by that committee to report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (S. R. 75) accepting the invitation of the Government of Norway to take part in an international fisheries exposition to be held at the city of Bergen, Norway, from May to September, A. D. 1898.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution. The time is very short.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The preamble recites that the United States has been duly invited by the Government of Norway to take part in an international fisheries exposition to be held at the city of Bergen, Norway, from May 16 to September 30, A. D. 1898, which exposition will also include national sections for industries, agriculture, and the fine arts.

The joint resolution accepts the invitation and directs the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries in person, or by a deputy to be appointed by the President of the United States, to represent the United States at the exposition, and to cause a suitable and proper exhibition and display to be made at the exposition of the food-fishes of the United States, and the methods of catching, salting, curing, and preserving the same, and of the implements and appliances used in carrying on the fishery industries of the United States, and to this end he may, at his discretion, use any portion of the collection in the National Museum.

It appropriates $20,000, to be immediately available, and to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State, to pay all the expenses and costs of representing the United States at the exposition and to pay all the costs and expenses and outlays pertaining or incident to the making and carrying on of the exhibition and display aforesaid.

It also directs the commissioner, or his deputy, to make a full report to the Department of State of the participation of the United States in the exposition, and of all the information and results acquired and obtained at or by means of the exposition touching the fishery industry throughout the world.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Pension Calendar will be taken up.

PLUMY E. MARDEN.

The bill (S. 495) granting a pension to Plumy E. Marden was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Plumy E. Marden, daughter of Benjamin Chote, late a soldier in Colonel Poor's regiment and afterwards in Capt. Edward Burbank's company in the war of the Revolution, and to pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MOSES M. CRANTS.

The bill (S. 1751) granting a pension to Moses M. Crants was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 8, after the word "of," to strike out "$72 per month, in lieu of the pension heretofore allowed him, as specified in pension certificate No. 131457" and insert "$30 per month, in lieu of the pension of $24 he is now receiving;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Moses M. Crants, late a private in Company G, One hundred and seventh Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, at the rate of $30 per month, in lieu of the pension of $24 he is now receiving, to take effect from and after the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Moses M. Crants."

CELESTHIA A. WHITNEY.

The bill (S. 1318) granting a pension to Celesthia A. Whitney was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Celesthia A. Whitney, widow of Ingerson Whitney, late a private, unassigned, in the Fourteenth Maine Infantry.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to have the report read in that case. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire if there is any similar case where the Pension Office has decided that the report of the special examiner was against the claimant and the committee finds that it was in favor of him? It seems rather a strange coincidence.

Mr. GALLINGER. I did not hear the observation of the Senator.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will have the report read first, and that will show the case.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. GALLINGER June 29, 1897, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1318) granting a pension to Celesthia A. Whitney, have examined the same, and report:

A similar bill passed the Senate during the first session of the Fifty-fourth Congress and was reported favorably by the House.

The Senate report is as follows, which your committee adopt, and recommend the passage of the bill:

"Ingerson Whitney enlisted March 1, 1865, and was discharged May 11, 1865, for disability. He died January 3, 1890. His widow, claimant under this bill, applied for pension, alleging that soldier's death was due to a severe cold that he contracted in camp in consequence of the change of heavy clothing to the uniform of the military service. The claim was rejected on the ground 'that, aided by special examination, the claimant is unable to show soldier's death as due to his military service.' That language is explicit, but strangely enough a reference to the report of the special examiner does not seem to justify it.

"The special examination was made by H. E. Perkins, and seems to have been thorough and exhaustive, a large number of witnesses having been examined. Examiner Perkins closes his report in these words: 'I recommend the admission of the claim.'

"This certainly does not bear out the statement that, 'aided by special examination, the claimant is unable to show soldier's death as due to his military service.' On the contrary, if language means anything, it proves beyond the shadow of a doubt that the man who examined the witnesses under oath, some of them being the dead soldier's comrades, was fully satisfied of the justice of the claim.

"There is direct testimony on file showing that soldier contracted a severe cold as alleged, and also that he was constantly therafter sick until the date of his death. It is true that his period of service was very brief, but that should not be considered in connection with questions of fact regarding the incurrence of disabilities and the cause of death.

"Your committee report the bill back favorably and recommend its passage."

Mr. COCKRELL. The point I make is that the Pension Office rejected this claim because by the aid of a special examination it found that the testimony was not sufficient. When the committee examines the report of the special examiner it reports directly the reverse and recommends the claim. Was the attention of the Pension Commissioner called to this case? It is rather a strange proceeding if the special examiner shall go out into the field and make an examination and report the evidence, recommending that the claim be allowed, and then the Pension Office shall pass upon it and say that the special examination did not show anything.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think that it is not unusual for the Pension Bureau to ignore the recommendation of special examiners and to reach conclusions different from what the examiners reached. The report is correct, I have no doubt, in every particular, and that the examiner did find what the Pension Bureau says he did not find. The attention of the Bureau was not called to the case; the committee acted upon its own responsibility in reporting the bill. It ought to pass.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HALE in the chair). If there be no amendment as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. MARTHA L. BOHANNON.

The bill (S. 1866) granting a pension to Mrs. Martha L. Bohannon, of Lynchburg, Va., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Martha L. Bohannon, widow of Private Miles R. Bohannon, of Capt. E. W. Paul's battalion of Missouri Volunteers in the Mexican war, at $8 per month.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report in that case be read. There must be some mistake in the bill. Was there any Captain Paul's battalion? We never had any such organization in Missouri that I know anything about in the Mexican war. We did have Powell's battalion. The report may give some explanation regarding it.

Mr. GALLINGER. The report states that this soldier was in Capt. E. W. Paul's battalion. There may be a mistake about it, and perhaps the bill had better go over until the Senator can have an opportunity to examine it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. KENNEY June 29, 1897, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1866) granting a pension to Martha L. Bohannon, have examined the same and report:

A similar bill was introduced in the Senate in the Fifty-fourth Congress, reported favorably, and passed the Senate.

The report was as follows, which your committee adopt, and recommend the passage of the bill:

"Claimant is the widow of Miles R. Bohannon, who served as a private in the war with Mexico, in Capt. E. W. Paul's battalion Missouri Volunteers, from January 5 to October 10, 1848. During this time he was stationed at Jefferson Barracks, Mo., and Forts Leavenworth and Mann, on extra duty as acting assistant hospital steward.

"The soldier died January 19, 1895. The widow's claim for pension under the general law was rejected by the Pension Bureau 'on the ground that the soldier did not serve in Mexico, on the coast or frontier thereof, or en route thereto, sixty days.' This, as it will be observed, is a technical legal objection which, while it bars action by the Pension Bureau, does not militate against the equities of the claim.

"Your committee believe the claimant entitled to a pension."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NATHAN MITCHELL.

Mr. COCKRELL. The bill proposes "to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Milton T. Bedford, late of Company B, One hundred and fifty-first Regiment Ohio National Guard Infantry." Is that a regiment of the present National Guard, or one formed during the war?

Mr. GALLINGER. I take it for granted that the service was rendered during the war of the rebellion.

Mr. COCKRELL. The report does not show anything at all about it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think there can be no question about it. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. HANNA] reported the bill. I am sure the question must have been raised in the committee, because the committee would be unwilling to grant a pension such as the Senator alludes to.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is what I supposed, but I should like to ascertain.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move to amend the bill by inserting, after the word "Infantry," in line 7, the words "at the rate of $12 per month."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE HOLMAN.

Mr. TURPIE. Mr. President, I call for the special order, the memorial services in honor of the late Hon. WILLIAM S. HOLMAN, and I ask unanimous consent that the prayer of the Chaplain, delivered this morning, may be printed in the RECORD as a part of the exercises.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There being no objection made to the request of the Senator from Indiana, that order will be made.

The prayer is as follows:

Hearken to our devout and earnest prayers, O Lord God, in behalf of thy servants, the Senators from South Carolina. Restore them to health and soundness. Bless the means which are being used for their recovery to health. Grant them quietude of mind and peace.

As the Senate pays its tribute to the memory of a venerable and eminent member of the House of Representatives, grant that a solemn sense of our mortality may rest upon every heart, and that we may so apply our hearts unto wisdom as that when the time for our change shall come we may be gathered in peace and pass to Thy right hand. Through Jesus Christ our Saviour. Amen.

Mr. TURPIE. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the resolutions of the House of Representatives.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolutions of the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, July 8, 1897.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. WILLIAM S. HOLMAN, late a Representative from the State of Indiana.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased and in recognition of his eminent abilities as a distinguished public servant the House, at the conclusion of these memorial proceedings, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk be instructed to communicate a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

Mr. TURPIE. Mr. President, I submit the resolutions which I send to the desk.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. WILLIAM S. HOLMAN, late a Representative from the State of Indiana.

Resolved, That the business of the Senate be now suspended in order that fitting tribute may be paid to his memory.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted by the Secretary of the Senate to the family of the deceased; and that as a further mark of respect the Senate will, at the conclusion of these ceremonies, stand adjourned.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President, I rise to pay my tribute to the memory of WILLIAM STEELE HOLMAN, late a member of Congress from the State of Indiana.

I regret that I can not speak of him from the fullness which comes of long personal association and friendship, for I had the privilege and pleasure of meeting him but once, and that was at the opening of the last session of Congress. Our ways in life had been apart. We were opposed in our political associations and party sympathies; so that I am unable to speak of him except as I knew him through others and through his official acts, which have become a part of the country's history.

Mr. HOLMAN was born in a log cabin in Dearborn County, Ind., September 6, 1822, and died in the city of Washington, D. C., April 22, 1897.

His mother was a daughter of Judge Richard M. Masterson, of Carrollton, Ky., an influential citizen of that State. It is said that she was possessed of a liberal education and that she was a lady of strong character and superior attainments.

His father, Judge Jesse L. Holman, was educated for the bar under the tutorage of Henry Clay. In 1810, soon after his admission to the bar, he removed to Indiana, where he entered upon the practice of his profession. His ability as a young lawyer was quickly recognized, and he was early appointed prosecuting attorney of Dearborn County. He became a member of the Territorial legislature in 1814 and was chosen speaker of the body. His legislative experience led to his selection as circuit judge, and upon the admission of the Territory to statehood he was promoted to a position on the supreme bench by appointment of the governor. After acceptable service for fourteen years in the highest judicial tribunal of his adopted State, he resumed the practice of the law. But a few years later, in 1834, he was called to the United States district bench of Indiana by President Jackson, and there served with general satisfaction to the bar and the people until his death in 1842. He was distinguished for his strong sense of public duty and for the soundness of his judgments. Thirty-one years of his life were devoted to the public service.

It was from this ancestry that WILLIAM STEELE HOLMAN came. From father and mother he inherited those traits of character which made him one of the trusted and illustrious men of his time; conservative in judgment, patient and exhaustless in research, and true to his convictions. He came of an ancestry devoted to the public service, and was early possessed of a desire to serve his countrymen in honorable station.

Young HOLMAN was educated in the public schools and Franklin College, and then became a school-teacher, as an aid to entrance to the bar. His admission to the bar was moved in 1843, when he had but reached his majority. The same year he received a rare distinction by being called to the position of probate judge of his native county.

In 1849 he was elected prosecuting attorney, and the following year was chosen a delegate to the constitutional convention of Indiana, a most exacting and important office. The convention was composed of men of more than ordinary ability and force of character, some of whom rose to national prominence. There were Schuyler Colfax and Thomas A. Hendricks, who became Vice-Presidents of the United States; William H. English, once a candidate for that high office; Alvin P. Hovey, late governor of Indiana; John Pettit and Horace P. Biddle, supreme judges; Robert Dale Owen, William McKee Dunn, Michael G. Bright, James Lockhart, and others who wrought honorable careers in the service of the State—men of profound learning and orators of high rank. Fortunate indeed the State which had such men to fashion its organic law. In this assembly of able men, with perhaps nowhere else a counterpart, Mr. HOLMAN sustained himself with ease and honor.

He was elected to the general assembly which convened in 1851, the first after the adoption of the new constitution, and there vindicated the confidence of his constituency by his devotion to the performance of his legislative duties.

Official honors fell fast upon him, and in 1852 he was elected to the common pleas bench of his district. The discharge of his judicial functions still further strengthened his hold upon the people and opened to him a wider field of effort and usefulness.

In 1859 he entered Congress, where he early won favorable attention and continued to grow in the respect of the country. His repeated return to his seat in the House of Representatives, with but two exceptions, from his entrance to his death marks an exceptional Congressional tenure.

I take pride, Mr. President, in bearing testimony to the many virtues of this distinguished Representative of my State. His public career was of unusual length; his life was virtually devoted to the cause of his countrymen. In the highest and best sense he was a servant of the people.

He lived in a State where political divisions have been unusually sharp and at a time when party feeling ran high, and it is quite natural that during a term of service spanning fully forty years his public acts should have been at times harshly criticised and his motives subjected to ungenerous interpretation, but I believe the undivided judgment of his contemporaries, without regard to party affiliations, is that he possessed a high sense of civic duty, to which he yielded unfailing loyal obedience, and that no stain ever touched his official garments.

Born amidst the hardships and vicissitudes of pioneer life, he early learned the lessons of industry and frugality, and these he carried into the public service. His early school was the one in which the best citizens are reared and the profoundest statesmen are tutored. He was an apt student of nature; it taught him the invaluable lesson of the universal brotherhood of man. He was sympathetic, and from the beginning made the cause of his neighbors his own. Between them there was a mutual confidence which endured. The trust and faith in him which his constituency repeatedly expressed from early manhood to his lamented death was a sublime tribute which surpasses what we may utter here to-day. Those who knew him best trusted him most. What more need be said?

My tribute is to those qualities, those attributes which enlist the admiration of political adversaries—honesty, industry, and exalted purpose. I do not withhold it because of an irreconcilable difference in our political convictions. Political parties are undivided as to purpose—the highest and best welfare of the country; their differences arise as to the best method of attaining the end.

As a member of the bar, he was diligent and successful; as a judge, he was conscientious in his research, impartial and fearless in his judgments; as a member of the constitutional convention, he left the impress of his genius upon the organic law of his native State; as a member of the legislature and of Congress he addressed himself to the people's service with commendable ardor and single purpose.

When the integrity of the country was in debate, Mr. HOLMAN took the side of the Union, and against the judgment of many of his party advisers; he foresaw better than they, and was resolute in his support of national unity.

He lived in the most interesting period of our national history, and from his entrance to the House of Representatives to his death was a prominent figure among the eminent men of his time.

Mr. Blaine has left his measure of his work: "His efforts," said he, "were steadily and persistently directed to the enforcement of public economy; the country owes him a debt of gratitude for the integrity, intelligence, and simplicity with which he has illustrated a most honorable career as representative of the people." Praise from Sir Hubert is praise indeed!

He raised his standard of exalted duty in public place, and to it remained inflexibly true. He was possessed of superb moral courage, and his purpose once set, he was immovable. The stock of which he came was strong, rugged. It laid the broad foundation for a mighty empire of wealth, of power, of intelligence in the great Mississippi Valley. He was a type of which there are too few.

Mr. President, we reluctantly retire from the contemplation of a character so illustrious in achievement and devotion to the cause of his countrymen. He has richly earned the "Well done, thou good and faithful servant," and the repose which crowns an honest life.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. President, when I first came to Congress, many years ago, I made the acquaintance of Hon. WILLIAM S. HOLMAN. He was then a member of the House of Representatives and one of its prominent leaders. It was easy to be seen that he was a laborious student. He was familiar with all the subjects that belong to the legislation of our Government, and well informed in all branches of its history. His ability as a statesman was recognized by everyone, and that ability he devoted to the welfare of his country and the perpetuity of its institutions. There was never any doubt as to which side of any public question he would espouse. He was a Democrat of the old school. He believed that the mission of Government was to secure to everyone under its authority every right. He looked with a jealous eye on all legislation. He openly challenged every attempt to cross the boundary that separates the jurisdiction of the Government from that of the citizen. He believed that with liberty secured, all other blessings would come as legitimate results of her beneficent reign.

Grounded on that faith, he was ever found in opposition to all schemes of paternalism. He believed with the great statesman who founded the party to which he belonged that economy in government was the greatest of public virtues; that extravagance led to corruption, and corruption to the loss of all that government was designed to secure. Hence he was found challenging every measure that proposed unnecessary expenditure. Many of those he consigned to the tomb by sitting in his seat and watching, and when the decisive moment came speaking out firmly, "I object." I have often seen members beg, entreat, and implore him to withdraw his objection and let the House consider their bills, but nothing could move him.

His familiarity with the details of legislation, his love of work, and his disposition to investigate closely all proposed appropriations of public money were qualities that well adapted him to the Committee on Appropriations, of which he was a member as long as I remained in the House. A part of the time, when his party was in the majority, he was its chairman. In each branch of Congress that committee is the most laborious, and upon its shoulders are laid the heaviest responsibilities of legislation. Every expenditure, just and unjust, raps at its doors for admission. Oftentimes appropriations are pressed by Representatives, Senators, officials of the different Departments, and persons outside the public service. It is very important to have that committee composed of legislators who can say "no," however strongly they may be importuned.

Judge HOLMAN could do that, and, having said the word, could stick to it with a smile on his face. He knew how to say "no" without offending. To every item in an appropriation bill he gave a rigorous and painstaking investigation. Many of them went from that investigation to the wastebasket, many of them were severely pruned, and all of them brought within the limits of just expenditure. No item, however small, ever escaped his eye, and when the bill carrying multiplied millions was reported to the House for passage he was always in his place, thoroughly informed and ready to defend it against all comers and equally ready to assail every item proposed to be added by any member of the House.

He has been called the "watchdog of the Treasury," and was well worthy to wear all the honors that word implies. Like a faithful sentinel, he challenged every comer who proposed to draw upon the public vaults. Millions of money was saved to the public Treasury while he was on the committee that guarded it, and the people whose rights he watched over with such sleepless eyes never knew how great was the debt they owed him.

Judge HOLMAN was constant in his attendance on the House. He spoke often, never long, but always to the point. He had no humor in his soul, no imagery in his imagination. He dwelt in a world of facts, and he never tried to go beyond its boundaries. An examination of the RECORD will show that nearly all his utterances were on the subject of economy in the public expenditure. I can not recall the fact that he ever spoke on taxation, currency, public indebtedness, or foreign relations. He had fixed and riveted convictions on all these subjects, and always supported the measures of his party, but he seemed to have no inclination to discuss them.

His public life was a demonstration of the truth that to be thoroughly informed on any subject one must devote all his time to it. On one occasion I heard him for twenty minutes discuss the foreign policy of our country as it had been defined by our predecessors, and he not only astonished everyone around him, but charmed them as well. He was a party man, but not a partisan. He had little or no party combativeness. He did not seek the encounter with his party opponents, and when it was offered to him, as it sometimes was, he would waive the invitation away with a smile. He disliked the tilt. He turned away from hard words. His disposition was kindly and amiable. In his intercourse with his fellow-man he was as gentle as a child, but in carrying out what he believed to be right he was as immovable as a mountain.

One who knew no more of Judge HOLMAN than what he heard in the short speeches in the House might come to the conclusion that he was only an accountant, trained at some bureau of one of the Departments to scrutinize its expenditures and disapprove improper allowances. But one who knew him personally, who lived in close association with him and shared in his social hours, would soon find that error dispelled. He would soon see that he was an able and ready lawyer and well read in the history and literature of his country.

No man could have held his place as a Representative as long as he did unless he was a man of superior ability and had with it a character that commanded the confidence and affection of those who so often commissioned him to represent them in the councils of the nation.

Indiana, as she lays him to rest in her bosom, may well say of him, "He was an honest man, a good citizen, a faithful Representative, and his record as a public servant is one of which his country, his family, and his friends may well be proud."

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, WILLIAM S. HOLMAN, to whose memory and worth it is my sad duty to-day to bear willing tribute, was born in Dearborn County, Ind., on September 6, 1822, and died April 22, 1897, in his seventy-fifth year.

He inherited from his able and distinguished father, Judge Jesse L. Holman, and a cultured and noble mother, a healthy body and a sound, vigorous mind—the richest and most valuable inheritance.

His father located in the Indiana Territory, in Dearborn County, in 1810; was a lawyer by profession; was prosecuting attorney for his county; member and speaker of the Territorial legislature, and one of the two Territorial judges.

On the admission of the Territory of Indiana into the Union as a State in 1816 he was appointed one of the supreme judges of the State and served as such fourteen years. In 1834 President Jackson appointed him United States district judge, which high position he held up to his death in 1842.

He was an able lawyer, a learned, just, impartial, and incorruptible judge, and a worthy exemplar, who devoted thirty-one years of his useful life to the public service. WILLIAM S. HOLMAN, the worthy son of an illustrious father, was reared in a legal and political atmosphere, which naturally led him to choose the law as his profession and to seek the public service. In early life he united with the Baptist Church, remained a communicant to his death, and was for years a teacher in the Sabbath school.

In his twenty-first year he married Miss Abigail Knopp, a lady of high character and liberal attainments.

He was admitted to the bar in 1843, and in the same year was elected probate judge of his county.

In 1849 he was chosen prosecuting attorney of his district.

In 1850 he was elected a delegate from his county to the constitutional convention of his State.

In 1851, the first election under the new constitution, he was elected a member of the lower house of his State legislature, and, though among the youngest members, was made chairman of the judiciary committee.

In 1852 he was elected judge of the common pleas court of his district.

In 1854 he was nominated by the Democratic Congressional convention of his district as a candidate for Congress and was defeated.

In 1856 he was a candidate for the nomination for Representative in Congress and was defeated for the nomination.

In 1858 he was again the candidate for the nomination for Congress, was nominated and elected to the Thirty-sixth Congress, 1859–1861, from the Fourth Congressional district.

In 1860 he was the nominee and elected to the Thirty-seventh

Congress, 1861–1863, and to the Thirty-eighth Congress, 1863–1865; was defeated for the nomination in 1864 for the Thirty-ninth Congress, and nominated and elected to the Fortieth Congress, 1867–1869, from the same district.

In 1868 the Congressional districts had been redistricted, and he was nominated and elected to the Forty-first Congress, 1869–1871, from the Third district, and to the Forty-second Congress, 1871–1873, and to the Forty-third Congress, 1873–1875, from the same district.

In 1874, the State having been again redistricted, he was nominated and elected to the Forty-fourth Congress, 1875–1877, from the Fifth district.

In 1876 and 1878 he was the nominee for Congress, and defeated by that gallant soldier and able and eloquent campaigner, Gen. Thomas M. Browne.

In 1880 he was again the nominee, and elected to the Forty-seventh Congress, 1881–1883, and was successively nominated and elected to the Forty-eighth Congress, 1883–1885, and to the Forty-ninth, Fiftieth, Fifty-first, Fifty-second, and Fifty-third Congresses, 1885–1895.

In 1894, the year of general Democratic disaster and defeat, he was the nominee, and defeated, but remained undismayed and unswerving in his devotion to the true principles of his party.

In 1896 he was again the nominee, and triumphantly vindicated by his election to the Fifty-fifth Congress, 1897–1899, in the full enjoyment of all his mental faculties, though in declining health.

Less than a year prior to his death, Judge HOLMAN suffered an irreparable loss in the sudden death of his devoted and noble wife—the tender and affectionate companion in his home and the sharer in his sorrows and joys, his defeats and triumphs—which bereft his life of its former buoyancy and happiness and told upon his physical health.

His life is a most eventful and instructive one in the midst of the most trying and critical period of our country's history.

His service in the House of Representatives in fifteen Congresses and in entering upon the sixteenth—his thirty-first year—is longer than that of any Representative dead or living. He received more nominations for Congress and from more different Congressional districts than any other Representative in Congress ever did—twice defeated for the nomination, four times nominated and defeated, and sixteen times nominated and elected.

Practically his whole life was devoted to the public service in his native State and in the Congress of the United States.

What was the talisman of his wonderful career and success?

In my humble judgment it was his honest, fearless, faithful, laborious, and conscientious discharge of every duty and obligation devolving upon him in every position of honor, trust, and profit committed to his charge. As probate judge, prosecuting attorney, delegate in the constitutional covention, member of the State legislature, judge of the common pleas court, and Representative in Congress he discharged every duty and obligation honestly, fearlessly, faithfully, conscientiously, and industriously, with an eye single to the best interests of the great masses of the people and of his State and country. Not the breath of even a suspicion of dishonesty, fraud, corruption, or prostitution of his official positions to his personal enrichment or aggrandizement ever rested upon his personal or public life.

In every office he held he gained and maintained the respect and confidence of his constituents, his State, and the country, and proved himself worthy of and deserving still higher honors and greater trusts.

In the House he was a member of the select committee on Government contracts during the war, and of the special committee to inquire into the causes of the decline of our commerce, and of the Committees on Claims, War Claims, Commerce, and chairman of the Committees on Public Buildings and Grounds and of Appropriations and Indian Affairs.

His knowledge and comprehension of governmental affairs, the public service and its best interests, were wonderfully accurate.

He was a steadfast believer in and earnestly devoted to the true, imperishable principles of his party as so concisely enunciated by Jefferson, and never swerved from their enforcement in public affairs.

He was devoted to his native State and its people, but never unmindful of the interests of our whole country. He had an abiding faith in the people and jealously watched and guarded what he honestly believed to be their best interests, and to the fullest extent enjoyed their respect and confidence. He believed in and energetically enforced economy in the public expense, that labor may be lightly burdened, and earnestly opposed all subsidies and gratuities to the favored few at the expense of the masses. He was plain and simple in his manners, accessible to and approachable by all, open, sincere, and frank, and was in its best sense a man of the people.

He was a lover of flowers, his farm home, and surroundings, a kind and devoted husband, a true and warm friend, and free from jealousy and selfishness. He was a patriot and devoted to an indissoluble Union of indestructible States, and during the trying times of the war labored faithfully and earnestly in the support and maintenance of the cause of the Union.

In the whole history of our nation few men have occupied the positions and exerted the beneficial influences in the House of Representatives which he did. His absence will be greatly missed and his place most difficult to fill.

Full of years, full of honors, ever faithful in the discharge of every trust and duty, "like one that wraps the drapery of his couch about him and lies down to pleasant dreams," he quietly passed from the scenes of his illustrious career to the realities of an endless life in the, to us, invisible world.

In paying these tributes to his life and honor to his memory, we honor ourselves and the people who honored him.

Mr. TURPIE. Mr. President, I have received a letter from the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] accounting for his absence at this time, which I ask to have read and inserted as a part of the services.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the letter.

The Secretary read as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., December 17, 1897.

MY DEAR SENATOR: An important exigency, communicated to me by telegram last night, renders it absolutely necessary that I leave this morning for Chicago at 10.50, thus, of course, compelling me to forego the tribute to the memory of Judge HOLMAN which I had prepared.

I greatly regret the situation, and I will take it as a great kindness if you will at some time during the ceremonial state that I was to have joined in the tribute to Judge HOLMAN, but have been precluded from doing so by unexpected and enforced absence from the city.

My memory of Judge HOLMAN goes back to the days of my boyhood, and there are many, many reasons why I desired to participate in the ceremonial. My father and he were devoted friends.

I would not like, when the exercises are published, to have any Indianian think that I was present and silent.

In great haste, yours, sincerely,

JOHN C. SPOONER.

Hon. DAVID TURPIE.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, the insoluble mystery of life and death is always before us.

We come into the world without being consulted, stumble, fall, sin and suffer, and are helpless in the presence of death. All our race, one after another, pass away, but no message comes back to the living; nor can words of ours penetrate the windowless home of the dead and awaken its silent occupant.

We can not reach the dead, but it is right and just that the colleagues of every public servant should place upon enduring record their estimate of his character and services. The history of patriotic and unselfish labor for the general good arouses the living to higher motives and nobler actions.

I knew WILLIAM S. HOLMAN for nearly twenty years.

In many respects he was a very remarkable man. His brusqueness of manner and seeming reserve and abstraction impressed those who did not know him well with the idea that he was cold, unsympathetic, and even ascetic. In fact, while not effusive, nor given to gush and impulse, he was kindly in nature and affectionate in all the relations of life. The poor, humble, and unfortunate, when worthy and deserving, found him an earnest friend.

He was æsthetic in his tastes, fond of music, flowers, the beauty of art and nature, and the companionship of great authors. His home was that of a refined, cultured scholar, devoted to all that elevates the mind.

As a legislator he was invaluable. Patient, indefatigable, thoroughly informed on all public questions, honest and fearless, he saved to the Government millions of dollars by his watchful opposition to every scheme of plunder.

He possessed that moral courage, far superior to the combative instinct of the battlefield, which faces alone and unsupported ridicule, abuse, and calumny.

For years he was derided as "a watchdog of the Treasury" and "the great objector," but he never faltered in his stern and relentless opposition to the extravagant and profligate waste of public money. He believed that the taxes of the people should be expended with the same care and economy that control the business of a prudent citizen, and he opposed all governmental partnership by which classes and individuals are enriched at the expense of the toiling masses.

No monument can be erected to his memory so splendid and enduring as his life's history. Always on guard, ever ready for conflict, if there had been a flaw in his armor the jobbers and lobbyists would have found it; but in all the years, under point of spear and edge of sword, his character for honesty and patriotism was never even assailed.

On the stone which marks his grave in the district that honored itself by giving him to the country should be placed this epitaph:

Here sleeps
WILLIAM S. HOLMAN,
The honest, watchful, courageous Congressman, who never slept when guarding the National Treasury against peculation and fraud.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I enjoyed a long and I think I may with propriety say an intimate acquaintance with Judge HOLMAN, having served with him in the House of Representatives for ten years, two of which we were members of the same committee, and having been a guest with him at the same hotel for the last ten or twelve years of his public service. I learned, sir, in that time to have for him as a legislator a most profound respect, and as a man, deep personal affection.

He possessed many admirable traits of character. As a public man his fidelity to the Government he served and to the people he represented no one familiar with his career ever dreamed of questioning. As a guardian of the public Treasury he was most watchful, accepting and acting a rôle the most of us would shrink from at once. His popularity as a member of the House he never weighed in the balance with his duty, and he never surrendered one jot or one tittle of the latter to secure the former.

He was known as "the great objector," but he never gained that title by obstructing legislation for personal or partisan ends, from prejudice, passion, or pique, and while his colleagues on the floor, when they saw their pet measures delayed or defeated, may have felt a momentary irritation, naturally, I believe that confidence in the honesty and patriotism of his purposes was universal. He undoubtedly saved the Government many thousands of dollars, never counting the cost to himself.

He was, I think, the most conspicuous man for his strict attention to public duties I have ever known. He was never absent from House or committee where absence was avoidable. And not only was he present and in the performance of his duties in public, but he had no time which he called his own in private. I know personally that his rooms were besieged every night and that the doors were never closed.

He was, on account of his long experience and continued service in the House of Representatives, a good parliamentarian, an accomplishment almost absolutely necessary to success in that great body.

Judge HOLMAN himself never claimed, nor did he have, any of the graces of the orator, but he was a strong debater, a very dangerous opponent, because he never entered into a discussion without being fully equipped for the contest.

All strong men have some weakness. Judge HOLMAN was no exception to this rule. Whenever he heard coming up to him the cry of the soldier or the soldier's widow, he forgot the Treasury and left its door wide open. When Judge HOLMAN died the soldiers lost as good a friend as they ever had in the Congress of the United States.

While he was strict, and perhaps many people thought severe, in his economy in public expenditure, in his own he was liberal to prodigality. Every beggar and tramp and wrecked office seeker instinctively sought Judge Holman, and they never left him empty-handed. I have known him many a time, after he had disbursed all the money he had with him, to call upon a neighbor for a few more dollars, saying that some poor fellow was in distress and needed it. I was appointed once to speak at Lawrenceburg, in his district. He addressed a meeting the evening before, opening his speech with the information that a poor widow in town had, a few days before, lost her only cow by accident; that she was in great trouble because she could not replace it; and made the declaration that there would be no speech that evening until sufficient money had been contributed to make up the loss. The necessary contribution was promptly made, the Judge being the most generous giver, then politics resumed its sway.

In his family he was one of the most delightful and charming men I ever knew. He and his dear wife, who crossed "the covered bridge" just before him, all the time I knew them so intimately, were as tender, as courteous, as devoted to each other as when they were bride and groom. To his children he was a father indulgent to a fault.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] has written for him his epitaph. I will write for him mine. "He was faithful, just, charitable, affectionate." Perhaps Senators will say that these are homely and modest virtues, not brilliant, not glittering. To be sure, but they are as eternal as the hills.

Who of us in the Senate to-day remembers the battles fought and the victories won by Sir Philip Sidney? Who of us forgets that cup of cold water given to the dying soldier? On the monument erected to that great English soldier, General Gordon, there is inscribed these words: "At all times and everywhere he gave his strength to the weak, his substance to the poor, his sympathy to the suffering, his heart to God." Nobler tribute than that never was paid to man, and it will live long after that marble monument has crumbled into dust.

Mr. TURPIE. Mr. President, the Hon. WILLIAM S. HOLMAN, lately deceased, a member of the House of Representatives of the Fifty-fifth Congress from the Fourth district of the State of Indiana, was first elected to that body in 1858, and with brief interruptions remained continuously in the same service until April 22, 1897, the time of his death. His public life may thus be said to have covered the period of almost forty years. His actual service, had he lived to complete the term for which he was last chosen, would have been thirty-two years, a length of time almost equal to that of a whole generation. He was a member of Congress before the war, and of the Congress which sat at the commencement of and during the war.

The great civil war, with the issues incident thereto, strongly mark a very momentous epoch in our history. The burning questions of that day came very early, at the very beginning of his career, to Mr. HOLMAN. His answer thereto, and his action concerning the same, were neither tardy nor uncertain. He was for the Union at all risk and at every cost. He supported the prosecution of the war for the Union with fervent zeal, with unflagging constancy. He had all his life resided on the very line of the border between the free and slave States. He represented the people of a border district. His constituents had with their neighbors of Kentucky, and indeed with the people of the entire South, through the great commerce of the Ohio River, the most intimate and congenial relations; but these things cost him not a moment's hesitation.

In the very outset he took his position of loyalty to the Union, and his course contributed largely in its influence, both upon public and private opinion, to the success of that policy which preserved the Government and the Union of the States unimpaired from the gravest peril that had yet threatened their existence. He did not disguise, deny, or seek to evade the very serious consequences of the armed conflict which ensued. Many of his warmest, most devoted personal and political friends engaged in the military service of the United States. They were not left to the care or attention of others. He followed their fortunes in the field or on the march with the most constant solicitude. Whatever could be done by him, either through public action or personal ministration, was done with fidelity, with the most perfect kindness and alacrity. Many an officer and soldier of the Indiana regiments received in time of trouble needed aid and recognition at his hands.

The same just and prescient regard for the consequences of the war is clearly shown by his record in Congress upon the subject of pensions to the soldiers of the Union. He always took the ground that the payment of pensions for injuries incurred during service to those who had borne arms in our behalf in that great contest was a part and portion of the war debt, as binding upon the conscience and honor of the nation as the bonds or coupons of the funded indebtedness. He therefore earnestly advocated, and voted at all times, for the appropriations necessary for the payment of the pension roll, and for every measure having for its object the speedy adjustment and fair settlement of pension claims. He spent some of the last hours of his active service in patient labor with his own hands in assisting some of his very numerous constituents in the presentation of their cases. It seemed to be a part of the man's life and conscience that, having vigorously supported the prosecution of the war, he did not desire to shun any responsibility therefor, but he felt under obligation to work while it was yet day with him, by all means and methods, for those who had suffered from the wounds or disabilities incident to the perils of that gigantic conflict.

Upon the close of the civil war his record upon the subject of reconstruction was as declarative and outspoken as it had been during the period of actual hostilities. He took and maintained the position that the States which had joined in the revolt against the National Government, having laid down their arms and having renewed their allegiance to the Constitution and laws of the country, were entitled to as full recognition and representation in Congress as upon the day of their original admission into the Union. Penalties were for persons, such persons as Congress might, for cause, subject to the same, not for States, and where the masses of the people of a State had by legislative action brought themselves into harmonious and practical relations with the Government, there ought, as he believed in such cases, to be no denial of any constitutional rights or privileges. He espoused and advocated these principles from the beginning, and adhered thereto until they became the settled policy and the established law of the land.

Besides the prominent part he bore in measures of national moment and concern, he was constantly engaged in the labors of one or more leading committees of the House. Indeed, his capacity for this kind of work and his supervision and recollection of almost innumerable details were very remarkable. During his protracted service in the House he not only regularly read every bill and report upon all subjects of interest, but he studied these papers—examined and verified their contents. He was, during the time of his active service, more thoroughly conversant with the Indian affairs, with the whole body of legislation relating to the public lands, and especially the entire system of appropriations than any member of either House of Congress.

He was a timely, earnest, constant friend and supporter of the homestead policy as applicable to the arable lands belonging to the Government. He contended that the public domain belonged to and should be exclusively reserved for the people. He insisted that there was no system of land grants or subsidies and no improvement of any character that could compare in profit and advantage to the country with the policy of colonizing the far West by a dedication of its broad areas of forest and prairie to be the homes of actual settlers.

His special services to his own constituency and to his native State, for many years connected with and directed to the improvement of the Ohio River and its affluents have been often the subject of public notice and of the highest appreciation. It would be difficult to describe or to designate any faculties or qualities of an ideal Representative which were not exemplified in the character and life of the veteran statesman whom we delighted to honor. His official course was marked by a just consideration of the constitutional rights and lawful interests of the people of the entire country, by special attention to the particular necessities and demands of his own State and of his immediate constituency, and by a faithful, diligent performance of every duty, which neither age nor time could slacken or abate.

His personal characteristics were well known; they have been often described. He was affable, easy of approach, attentive to the petitioner for aid or counsel. His long service and high position had no effect to remove him from the sphere of daily and hourly touch with the people. He was as near to his constituency on the last as on the first day of his service. He rebuked not importunity, but heard the matter over again, willingly, to the end. In his official labors at the capital he was no respecter of persons nor of parties. All received the same kindly, helpful, and impartial consideration.

Notwithstanding this, he was an earnest partisan, very strongly attached to the party of his choice. Indeed, one of the things most notable in the man was his political constancy. As a Democrat he commenced, as a Democrat he finished, his course. He lived and acted also in an era of great political change and upheaval, and of much tergiversation. His earlier campaigns, as well as his first canvass for Congress, were made against the Whig party. Subsequently he encountered the American, or, as it was called, the Knownothing party; then the Union party and platform, which figured so largely in Indiana during the first years of the war. Lastly he contended with the Republican organization. Yet he had as a politician a very long life. The people gave him this length of years, and they seem not to have charged against him as a fault or as any offense his steadfast adherence to that party whose tenets and policies he had in his youth espoused. Here is found a valuable lesson for the young men of this time who may entertain ambition for a public career. Few Representatives in Congress have rendered more useful or practical service to the country or to their constituencies than this lifelong partisan.

It is not true that the best services in the cause of our country or of mankind have been rendered by nonpartisans. The great revolutions and reformations in the promotion of human progress, the gains made in the protracted struggle for civil and religious liberty, the amendments to the Constitution and laws which have aggrandized the many as free moral agents, have been the work of partisans, of men who had beliefs, who held convictions and were willing to take sides for their maintenance at all hazards.

These reflections are neither casual nor irrelevant. They belong to this subject, and are a part—no unimportant part—of the history of the life which we commemorate. The lesson spoken of is written in the pages of this life in characters so large, so vivid, so distinct in outline that it ought not be overlooked or forgotten.

One of his finest traits was that of modesty, an unobtrusive demeanor without any assumption of importance or superiority. This is not to be excluded from the list of the virtues and graces of true manhood. In ordinary intercourse or private conversation he very rarely alluded to his own action or conduct in public affairs. He would describe a stirring incident which had occurred in the proceedings of the House, in which he had taken a principal part, without so much as mentioning his own presence. Often what he said or did became for the time the subject of public comment and attention, but what had been thus done or spoken by him did not have such notoriety for its end or object.

This very conspicuous trait in his character somewhat obscured many of his best attainments. They were unknown, therefore unnoticed.

His reading had been, in the course of his life, very extensive. He was a man of broad and liberal culture, well acquainted with the history of his country and with that of others, especially with the history of those nations, France and England, so intimately connected with our own. He was thoroughly conversant with English and American literature, and often quoted and alluded to our best classics with the warmest expressions of interest and appreciation. He was specially addicted to research in natural science. He had not only read much upon these topics, but his personal observations therein had been curiously close and accurate.

He was very much at home among plants and shrubs, buds and blossoms. He told me that he had been always fond of flowers, and had in early life rather looked upon leaves as dull and commonplace forms, but latterly he had changed his mind and taste. He found that the leaves of many plants and shrubs were as delicate and beautiful as flowers, and quite as fragrant.

The capacity for the enjoyment of such simple and elegant tastes was for him a fortunate condition. These calm and quiet studies of nature brought him a change of subject, afforded him rest and relaxation from the wearing exactions of public duty, a relief much needed amidst the labors of a life of official routine and ceaseless activity.

He dealt with the public moneys in the same manner as he dealt with his own—frugal in the most necessary expenditures, careless in none, opposing all extravagance, and especially hostile to schemes savoring of speculation or corruption. One of his maxims, always observed and enforced, was that the National Treasury ought never to be used for mere speculative projects however promising in return, and that it should be diligently watched and guarded against the insidious attacks of corporate and private interests.

One of the strongest traits of his character was attachment to his home. It was an ancestral home, and though not large in acres it was beautiful in its site and surroundings. Upon a high plateau, overlooking the Ohio River, three States were to be seen from the Holman homestead, and the landscape was so variegated as to be very attractive to one who from day to day looked upon its changing scenery. The owner of this mansion lived in it—indeed, really lived nowhere else. Though he spent much of his time at Washington and at other places in the discharge of his public duties, yet he dwelt at Verestau, the place of his birth—the farmhouse of his fathers. He personally undertook the care of the place—the fields, orchard, garden, and shrubbery. He cared much for trees, and when one or another of these old friends of the forest was marked for the ax he would be heard to say, in as startling tones as he ever addressed to the Speaker, "I object."

This love for home—its employments and associations—was as firm and constant in his early youth and manhood as in his latter days. Doubtless the public service had for him its fascination and singular attraction, as it may have for others. His reputation as a statesman and lawmaker was widely known, and his acquaintance with men and affairs in many parts of the country was large and intimate; but none of these things lessened his affection for the home of his youth. After every period of absence he returned thither with eagerness to spend his leisure upon the banks of the Ohio. Where he was born there he lived and labored, and there he was buried.

In the haste and celerity of our modern life, in its multitudinous distraction, in its rapid change of vocation and residence, and in its city hives and flats used as domiciles, the sentiment of hearth and home among us seems almost in danger of extinction. Here, then, we may well pause, taking at least time for breath in our hurry to consider and contemplate the example of this great American who made his home, his country home, the seat and center of his work and life. The public honors he won and wore, the fame he achieved in the national councils, the beneficence of his long Congressional service, were all deemed, in his mind, worthy only to adorn and to aggrandize his home.

Several years before his election to Congress Mr. HOLMAN had been, in 1849, chosen a member of the convention of our State which met in 1850 and which framed and submitted to the people for adoption our present constitution. In this assembly, composed of the most distinguished men of the State in both of the political parties then dominant, he held a very conspicuous position and established a great reputation, both among his colleagues in that body and the constituencies which they represented. Afterwards he was elected a member of the general assembly of the State which met in 1851. Upon this session of the legislature devolved the task of a revision of the statutes of the State then in force so as to bring the whole mass of previous legislation in accord and harmony with what was then called the new constitution.

In this assembly, also, his labors were of permanent utility and conceded excellence. Many of the members of this body had been members of the constitutional convention. His capacity and industry were well known and recognized. This session of our legislature lasted more than six months, the longest in the history of the State. It was called, in the parlance of those days, and is yet occasionally alluded to as the "long parliament." Both of these positions, much sought and coveted by the public men of that era, were attained by him after strenuous and exciting contests before the people with his political rivals and opponents.

Besides, in the brief intervals of his Congressional service, when he occasionally failed to be returned, he had yet always been the candidate of his party, so that the period of his active political canvass extended from 1849 to 1896, longer than that of any public man of either party in our State. The Holman campaign thus ran through nearly half a century. It was always in method and form the same, though of course in that lapse of time it comprised a great variety of subjects and was concerned with many and different political issues. His campaign was conducted by a public, open canvass, sometimes made by himself alone, at other times jointly with his competitor. His meetings for public speaking were usually held upon his own appointment. He journeyed from neighborhood to neighborhood and from county to county on his own motion, paying little attention to what is called the local organization. This was aided by a house-to-house canvass in certain localities, not careless or indifferent, though it might seem to be so, but full of discrimination. He traveled in his own conveyance, carried always a supply of documents, including his Congressional speeches, distributed freely to all those who wished them.

He took also with him a copy of the RECORD of Congressional proceedings, with which he often suddenly confounded some noisy disputant or a thoughtless competitor on the hustings who accused him of casting a vote which he never gave, or of an utterance which he had not made, but some other member had made on the same day and page of the RECORD.

To these instrumentalities was added a large current correspondence—personal letters written and signed by himself not only to political friends, but to political opponents, stating the reasons for his reelection. These letters were written in manly, nervous style, free and open. Of the many he may have written, not one was ever quoted to his disparagement; of the many even yet remaining among his people, not one appeals to the voter save in the highest and most honorable terms. These letters are now preserved as cherished mementos of the writer and of his career.

More than once in his course he encountered the boding wrath of legislative apportionment which threatened to destroy his majorities and to overwhelm his friendly constituencies. When the legislature of Indiana became Republican, one of the first things considered was how to exclude HOLMAN from the House of Representatives. His district was two or three times carefully changed and reconstructed so as to assure his defeat, but the design failed. "It is true," he has been heard to say on these occasions, "the legislature can make the district, but they can not choose the member. The people will choose the member; they will resent this political wrong." And so the event proved.

Once when the legislature had added to his old district the counties of Wayne and Fayette, with very large adverse majorities, intending to provide for his certain overthrow, public opinion came with such a strong trend in his direction that the stoutest posts and ramparts of the partisan apportionment were swept away, the highest and driest places of opposition were submerged by the flood tide in his favor; and the result was one of the greatest political triumphs in the history of Indiana. Of so little avail are apportionments when the people will otherwise.

As a public speaker, judged from the recorded experience of so constant success, he was exceedingly efficient. With many other qualifications for good fortune upon the hustings, he had one overshadowing merit—that of being easily understood by those who heard him. Men might approve, or disapprove, but they could not misunderstand him. His style of address to a popular audience was ordinarily plain, familiar, and colloquial, but not incorrect or inelegant. Facts, figures, dates, and amounts given upon his personal or official knowledge were stated with precision and accuracy. He spoke altogether extempore, but after careful thought and preparation. He seldom even used notes or memoranda, though he sometimes read from documents cited. He was of the most admirable temper, smooth, unruffled, impervious to irritation, undisturbed by interruption, in his bearing frank and manly, gifted with a reserve fund of patience which could not by any sort of device be exhausted.

His very active powers of reasoning and argument were under instant and immediate command. His spirit-stirring words of comment, exhortation, and encouragement were deftly fitted to the exigencies of the campaign as they arose from day to day. He did not often speak at great length, but always held the attention of his hearers closely. He was not versed in the modern accomplishment of being at the same time quite brief and very tedious. His voice could not be called loud or strong, yet it was clear. It wore well, and had in it a certain metallic resonance that carried his words to a distance, so that he was heard distinctly by a very numerous audience.

There was a curious method in his direct attack, or invective. These were not often resorted to. When he made use of invective, very keen, yet quiet, it was uttered altogether in the tone and manner of an aside, of something he had almost forgotten to say, something he cared nothing about repeating or remembering. The effect was very singular; it greatly enhanced the force of the words spoken.

His manner and style of speaking in the House of Representatives were the same as before the people, except that they were somewhat more deliberate, and disclosed also, consciously or unconsciously, forces in reserve which he might summon to his support. Upon his familiar themes in that House, and they were not few in number, he could call spirits from the vasty deep, and they came instantly at his bidding. When he had stated and declared the reasons for his opposition to a pending claim or appropriation as unjust, excessive, or fraudulent, and a member undertook to answer in defense of the same, the member made the mistake of attacking a strong man upon his strongest ground. HOLMAN'S reply in such case was not only an exposition, it was an exposure scathing and destructive. It left his assailant helpless, without the means of recovery. Often such a one became the subject of rebuke by the vote of the House, and by the later action of his own constituency. More than one honorable gentleman has begun and ended his Congressional career by an attack on HOLMAN.

The relations of mutual esteem and confidence between Mr. HOLMAN and the wise-hearted, generous constituency whom he represented became stronger and nearer. He learned more and more what his people wished and how to accomplish it. They learned to know him as a master workman, often accepted, many times approved, and they still continued to prefer him as against all other candidates for their favor.

Year after year, as the season for the campaign recurred, he proceeded to set forth, in order, a declaration of those things most surely believed among us of the Democratic faith.

In the latter days, in the last appeal which he made to the people near the close of his life, in the maturity of age and experience, he earnestly contended for the policy embodied in the Constitution, the free coinage and use of both silver and gold as full legal-tender money of the United States. And the people again set their final seal of approval upon his character, life, and doctrine by a sixteenth election to the House—an event very rare in political annals.

When he had entered the seventy-fifth year of his pilgrimage, when he had commenced the thirty-first year of his great employment in the national councils, he was one day missed from his accustomed place. Very soon it was known that he was not in attendance; he was absent, but not without leave; a message had come from the all-wise Master of Assemblies that he should rest from his labors.

During the last session of the Fifty-third Congress, which ended on March 4, 1895, I saw a great deal of Mr. HOLMAN. He was then serving in his fifteenth term. He called very often at my rooms in the Capitol. He complained frequently of his health; said that he felt his strength declining, and that the work of the House seemed to fatigue him much more than formerly. I spoke very cheerfully in reply—told him that he appeared in excellent health, and that he bore the winters at Washington much better than some of our younger men, but he still brooded somewhat over his condition. At last he said to me upon one of these occasions rather seriously, "That he supposed he would be no exception to the rule." I asked him what rule. He replied that it seemed to be accepted as a rule of the House that no member should ever live to finish his thirtieth year of service. The source of these forebodings then became apparent. There had been a tradition of long standing in the House that no member had survived to serve out his fifteenth term. Mr. Speaker Randall had died, in this regard, prematurely. Judge Kelley, for many years the father of the House, had died in the twenty-ninth year of his service. Mr. O'Neill, who succeeded Judge Kelley in that title, had died before the completion of his last term. Judge HOLMAN had for many years heard this tradition, and was not unaffected by it. I told him that every rule had its exceptions, assured him of his continued health and welfare, and that I believed he would fully serve out his term and break the line of tradition for once at least. When the session closed, on the morning after adjournment I called upon him at his rooms. I congratulated him upon the completion of the thirtieth year of his service, an unexampled instance in the House, a very notable era in his own life, in the history of our State, and in the annals of Congress. He received these congratulations with evident satisfaction, yet seemed to be in a mood quite sedate and serious, but at last said, smilingly, that he had been spared to make an exception to the rule, though he had thought for some months before that he would not live to be one.

I had the pleasure afterwards of meeting him quite frequently, upon his reelection to the Fifty-fifth Congress. He had been then the father of the House, and had besides the unique distinction of having already served a longer time in that body than any other member in its history, and of having been chosen to a sixteenth term of membership besides. This prolonged service, with its coincident seniority, had not been merely perfunctory. It had been accompanied at every stage by a vigilant, faithful, continuous discharge of public duty, and that true fame which is earned by real merit, by a stern and stainless integrity, the answer of a good conscience toward God and man, the most splendid trophy of a well-spent life.

Although Judge HOLMAN was a man of affairs in close contact with the varied political activities of this world, yet he had not forgotten—had always borne in present remembrance—the concerns of the world to come, the distant scene beyond. He had been from early manhood, and continued to the close of his earthly career, a steadfast believer in the Christian faith. He became and remained a member of the Baptist Church, and always took a lively interest in the progress and growth of that numerous and influential body. He frequently attended as a delegate its regular annual associations, and it was evident that he enjoyed the meetings and deliberations of these religious councils as much as he did those of the National Congress. It must have been certainly an interesting and edifying spectacle to have seen and heard the distinguished statesman, whom time had clothed with so many years and honors, discoursing upon some subject of discipline or doctrine among his brethren as one who, in his deliberations upon the great secular questions of his age, had yet kept and preserved his interest in the affairs of that grander and more glorious commonwealth—the church.

Firmly attached to the form of faith which he had so long and so worthily professed, yet he was in no sense proscriptive. As he had freely formed and retained his own religious opinions, he granted to all others the same liberty, not of charity only, but of right.

Thus his death has given us another witness to the doctrine of the life to come and of immortality. How often he has recited that magnificent climax of the great Apostle of the Gentiles:

> It is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption.
> It is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory.
> It is sown in weakness, it is raised in power.

The earthly form and life of our illustrious colleague have passed away, have perished; but the honor, the power, and the glory await him in the resurrection of the just.

The Senate (at 4 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.), in pursuance of the resolution unanimously agreed to, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Representative, adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, December 18, 1897, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, December 17, 1897.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PRINTING THE BANKRUPTCY BILL.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution I now send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, subject to the right of objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That 5,000 copies of the bill S. 1035, as amended by the Judiciary Committee of the House, and also of the report thereof from the Committee on the Judiciary, be printed for the use of the House.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will say, Mr. Speaker, that this is the bankruptcy bill, with accompanying report. Members tell me that there are so many applications for it from all parts that I feel justified in making this request.

Mr. BAILEY. Before consent is given, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman if this print has that analytical index and that bird's-eye view which accompanied the other bill?

Mr. HENDERSON. All of the artistic features which the gentleman alludes to have been eliminated from the bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAILEY. Then I have no objection.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered, and agreed to.

GILA VALLEY, GLOBE AND NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4769) to amend an act granting to the Gila Valley, Globe and Northern Railway Company a right of way through the San Carlos Indian Reservation, in Arizona.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to the right of objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5 of the act entitled "An act granting to the Gila Valley, Globe and Northern Railway Company a right of way through the San Carlos Indian Reservation, in the Territory of Arizona," approved February 18, 1895, be, and the same is hereby, amended so that said section shall read as follows:

"SEC. 5. That the right herein granted shall be forfeited by said company unless the road be constructed through the said reservation within four years after the passage of this act."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DINGLEY. Reserving the right to object, I would like to have some statement from the gentleman with reference to the request he makes.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I will state to the House the necessity for the passage of the bill at this time.

This railroad has been completed from a point on the Southern Pacific to the San Carlos Indian Reservation. The bill granting the right of way for the road was vetoed by President Cleveland because it did not contain a provision requiring the consent of the Indians on the reservation before the road was built.

The road, as I have said, has been built to the line of the reservation. There has been, however, great difficulty in obtaining the consent of these roving bands of half civilized, or uncivilized, Indians, and the delay in the construction of the road, after having built some 80 or 90 miles, has been caused entirely by this fact. The time in which the road was to have been built will expire now in a few weeks, and hence the necessity for the adoption of this legislation.

Mr. DINGLEY. The object of the bill is to extend the time.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It simply gives additional time to enable the company to get the consent of these Indians and go on with the work.

Mr. DINGLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman if the committee having jurisdiction over this subject has been consulted with regard to it?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Oh, yes; the committee has reported the bill. Mr. FISCHER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported the bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. Then I have no objection to its consideration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. There is an amendment, Mr. Speaker, in line 11 of the bill, striking out four and inserting two years as the limitation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BERRY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ASSIGNMENT OF COMMITTEE CLERKS.

Mr. ODELL. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Accounts to present a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York, the chairman of the Committee on Accounts, presents a privileged report, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred the resolution of the House authorizing and directing said committee to designate the committees of the House to which the clerks provided for by the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, should be allowed and assigned for the present Congress and to report by resolution to the House for its action thereon, respectfully report that they have examined into and considered said matter, and report to the House and recommend the passage of the following resolution, namely:

Resolved, That the eighteen clerks to committees of the House during the session provided for by the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, be, and they are hereby, allowed and assigned for the present Congress to the following committees, namely:

To the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, a clerk.
To the Committee on Education, a clerk.
To the Committee on Enrolled Bills, a clerk.
To the Committee on Invalid Pensions, an assistant clerk.
To the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, a clerk.
To the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands, a clerk.
To the Committee on Labor, a clerk.
To the Committee on the Library, a clerk.
To the Committee on the Militia, a clerk.
To the Committee on Mines and Mining, a clerk.
To the Committee on Pacific Railroads, a clerk.
To the Committee on Patents, a clerk.
To the Committee on Pensions, a clerk.
To the Committee on Private Land Claims, a clerk.
To the Committee on Printing, a clerk.
To the Committee on Railways and Canals, a clerk.
To the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, a clerk.
To the Committee on the Territories, a clerk.

And resolved, That the pay of the clerks to committees of the House of Representatives, which have been or may be hereafter authorized by the House, who are paid during the session only, shall begin from the time such clerks entered upon the discharge of their duties, which shall be ascertained and evidenced by the certificate of the chairman of the several committees employing clerks for the session only.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask for an explanation of the resolution. What does it carry?

Mr. ODELL. It carries $6 a day for each of these clerks. The provision is made in the legislative bill for the employment of eighteen clerks.

Mr. BINGHAM. Is this additional?

Mr. ODELL. No; it is regular. At every session the clerks are assigned.

Mr. LOUD. This is simply an assignment of the clerks provided for in the legislative bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. Then it does not increase the expense?

Mr. ODELL. Oh, no.

Mr. DOCKERY. This is the usual assignment resolution, and, as I understand, it involves no additional expense.

Mr. ODELL. That is correct.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. ODELL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CHARLES R. CRISP.

Mr. ODELL. I also submit the following report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred the following resolution, beg leave to report as follows:

Resolution No. 132, authorizing the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay to Charles R. Crisp, out of the contingent fund of the House, the sum of $76.50 for services rendered as private secretary, from the 1st to the 24th of October, 1896, to the late Charles F. Crisp, a Representative from Georgia in the Fifty-fourth Congress, is hereby returned approved.

Your committee therefore beg leave to report and recommend the adoption of the following, to wit:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Charles R. Crisp, out of the contingent fund of the House, the sum of $76.50 for services rendered as private secretary, from the 1st to the 24th of October, 1896, to the late Charles F. Crisp, a Representative from Georgia in the Fifty-fourth Congress.

The resolution was agreed to.

CLERKS TO CERTAIN COMMITTEES.

Mr. ODELL. I am also directed to report the following resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred sundry resolutions beg leave to report as follows:

Resolution No. 125. Resolved, That an assistant clerk be allowed the Committee on Claims during the sessions of the Fifty-fifth Congress, at the rate of $6 a day, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolution No. 89. Resolved, That the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is hereby authorized and directed to appoint a clerk for the sessions of the Fifty-fifth Congress.

Resolution No. 101. Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs is authorized to appoint a clerk for the sessions of the Fifty-fifth Congress.

Resolution No. 117. Resolved, That the chairman of the Naval Committee is hereby authorized and directed to appoint a clerk to his committee during the sessions of the Fifty-fifth Congress.

These resolutions are herewith returned, and a substitute for them is hereby presented, as follows:

Resolved, That an assistant clerk be allowed the Committee on Claims, to the Committee on Naval Affairs, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and the Committee on Military Affairs during the sessions of the Fifty-fifth Congress, at a compensation of $6 per day, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, and that the pay of such clerks to the above-named committees shall begin from the time such clerks enter upon the discharge of their duties, which shall be ascertained and evidenced by the certificate of the chairmen of the several committees employing clerks for the sessions only.

And as thus amended the committee approves the resolutions.

Mr. DOCKERY. As I understand this resolution, it provides for an additional clerical force.

Mr. ODELL. Not over the Fifty-fourth Congress. These same resolutions were adopted in the Fifty-fourth Congress, and these same committees had assistant clerks in that Congress.

Mr. DOCKERY. In that Congress?

Mr. ODELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOCKERY. I regret this resolution was not offered first. In the assignment of clerks to committees in the legislative bill there was an assignment of clerks to committees without any business. Some of these committees provided for by this resolution are business committees. In fact, all of them may be—I do not assert to the contrary—entitled to this additional clerical assistance. I do not, however, commit myself to that proposition; but it may be so.

Now, then, if this resolution had been offered in the first place, I think a suggestion would have come from some quarter to amend the assignment resolution so as to strike out from that resolution of assignment the clerk to the Committee on Mines and Mining, which probably never had a bill; the Committee on Railways and Canals, and some other committees that I do not now recall, that have no business of consequence to present to the House. I regret that the committee in the assignment of clerks did not provide for the committees named in this substitute out of the force authorized by the legislative bill.

Mr. ODELL. I will say to the gentleman from Missouri that the assignment of clerks made in the resolution directing us to make such assignment is the same that we made in the Fifty-fourth Congress. I was a member of the Committee on Accounts in that Congress, and I can say that we made a very careful investigation, and it was only after considerable thought that that assignment was made. There has been no change made in the assignments from that made in the Fifty-fourth Congress.

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman asserts, as I understand, that this does not increase the clerical force over the number authorized in the Fifty-fourth Congress.

Mr. ODELL. Not at all, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. But is an increase over the Fifty-third Congress.

Mr. ODELL. I think not. In the Fifty-third Congress there was an assignment of thirty-three session clerks.

Mr. BAILEY. Do you mean session clerks?

Mr. ODELL. I do. The number of session clerks, if this resolution should pass, would be twenty-two, while in the Fifty-third Congress there were thirty-three.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am not prepared to say what distinction there was between session and annual clerks. It is absolutely certain that the clerical force of the House and the committees of the House was not 33 per cent more in the Fifty-third Congress than in the Fifty-fourth Congress.

Mr. ODELL. Oh, no; I did not state—I said that there were thirty-three session clerks in the Fifty-third Congress provided for by the legislative bill, the same bill which provides for these eighteen clerks.

Mr. BAILEY. They were session clerks, and you have taken eleven of them and made them annual clerks?

Mr. ODELL. No, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. You say that only twenty-two are provided here?

Mr. ODELL. Only eighteen.

Mr. BAILEY. And twenty-two in the last Congress, I understood you to say.

Mr. ODELL. They have one less session clerk in this Congress than last year.

Mr. BAILEY. What have you done with our session clerks? Have you dropped them from the roll or made them annual?

Mr. ODELL. There was one gentleman who had sufficient influence with the Committee on Appropriations to have his clerk taken from the session roll and made an annual clerk, so that there are eighteen session clerks and one annual clerk, instead of nineteen session clerks, as in the Fifty-fourth Congress.

Mr. BAILEY. Then does the gentleman mean to tell me that in the Fifty-fourth Congress there was one less, and in the Fifty-fifth it is proposed to make eleven less? If there are to be less than the Fifty-third Congress, I shall be glad to vote for the resolution.

Mr. ODELL. I can only refer the gentleman to the bill, which calls for thirty-three clerks.

Mr. BAILEY. My judgment is that you have taken our session clerks and made them annual clerks.

Mr. ODELL. Not at all, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. Then you mean to say that you are providing for fourteen less clerks than we had in the Fifty-third Congress.

Mr. ODELL. I mean to say to the gentleman from Texas that we are providing for these eighteen clerks which are called for in the legislative bill, and that in the Fifty-third Congress there were thirty-three attending to these duties.

Mr. BAILEY. You are trying to provide for eighteen session clerks.

Mr. ODELL. That is all.

Mr. BAILEY. What has become of the others?

Mr. ODELL. They have been dropped.

Mr. BAILEY. Dropped, or carried to the annual roll?

Mr. ODELL. No, sir; they have not been carried to the annual roll. The extra session clerks to committees have been dropped entirely from the legislative bill.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, this is a matter that I have never given much attention, but it seems so improbable that our friends on the other side should have reduced the number of offices while they were in power that I think some explanation is required.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I think that I can furnish the explanation. The gentleman [Mr. ODELL] is probably correct in his statement that there were thirty-three session clerks during the Fifty-third Congress, and that a less number was provided during the last Congress and also a less number carried in the current law. The explanation arises entirely out of the fact of the passage of a resolution by the House authorizing members to employ clerks. That having been done, the Committee on Appropriations very properly reduced the number of session clerks, and in my judgment they would have acted with more wisdom if they had dropped them all, or substantially all.

Mr. BAILEY. I supposed there was some such explanation.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is the explanation. It arises out of the fact that the House authorized the employment of clerks by members, and therefore the Committee on Appropriations reduced the number from thirty-three to nineteen in the last House and to eighteen in the current law. It is not any reduction of expenditure, but it is a reduction in the number of clerks, as the gentleman from New York states, and the committee would have had my approval more entirely if they had stricken out all the session clerks.

Mr. ODELL. It is a reduction of expenditures, because the session clerks received $6 a day, while the clerks to Representatives receive only $100 a month.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is true. There comes in the $100 a month, and when you figure up the total you will find as a result that by giving clerks to members we have largely increased the expenditure. I do not, however, desire to charge that on any particular administration of the House.

Mr. ODELL. We are only performing our duty in accordance with the bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that in asking for the adoption of a resolution for assistant clerks there ought to be some explanation from the chairman of the committee as to the necessity for them. It seems to me that there ought to be a statement as to the number of hours which these clerks devote to their duties and as to whether there is an actual present necessity for this additional number.

Mr. ODELL. I will say to the gentleman that the committees to which these clerks are assigned are among the most important in the House—the Committee on Naval Affairs, the Committee on Interstate Commerce, the Committee on Military Affairs, and the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I can say for one committee that the Committee on Military Affairs has had an extra session clerk during my entire service, both during Democratic and Republican Congresses, and that the two clerks of that committee have all the work they can do. One of them is kept busy almost constantly by members of Congress looking up their matters and answering questions as to the status of their bills. There are in the neighborhood of 2,000 bills before the committee, many of them private bills, many of them bills that probably should never have been introduced, but members are the judges of that, and it is absolutely impossible for one clerk to do the business of the committee.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make one suggestion to our Democratic friends here who may possibly desire to intimate that this is an increase of expenditures. Let me say to you, gentlemen, in perfect candor that this is one of the evils that grew up many years ago, an incubus which we can not shake off. The Republican party in this Congress and in the last is not responsible for the system, because, as I have said, it has come down through many years. These committees have had assistant clerks; whether they needed them or not is not for us to determine. They have had them, and this House has not the courage to take them off. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. You are in favor of this resolution, are you not?

Mr. LOUD. Oh, well, I would rather the gentleman would not ask me that question. I am not opposing it.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Well, I do not see why anybody should object, if the gentleman from California is satisfied.

Mr. LOUD. If the gentleman wants an expression of opinion from me, let me say that I believe the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads has as much work as any of the committees mentioned in this list. I have a most competent secretary, who has a very good time after doing my work and the work of the committee.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. No doubt about that.

Mr. BAILEY. With that testimony before us, I think we ought to vote against allowing additional clerks to the Committee on Naval Affairs and the Committee on Military Affairs. My judgment is that the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads would probably have about as much work to perform—work which must be performed—indeed, more work than either the Committee on Naval Affairs or the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HULL. The Post-Office Committee has very important work to perform; there is no question of that; but so far as regards detail work, I suppose that committee has before it possibly one-tenth of the number of bills that we have, and they are bills of a public nature, upon which leading officers of the Government are heard. In investigating such bills but little work, comparatively, is required from the clerk, while the work before the Military Committee is of such a character that the clerks of that committee are very largely occupied in looking up information in order to answer the questions of members concerning the bills they have introduced.

Mr. BAILEY. Without having had service upon either the Committee on Naval Affairs or the Committee on Military Affairs, it seems to me that those two committees ought to have as little to do as any important committee of the House. We have a small Army, though larger than it ought to be and vastly more expensive. We have a Navy now that costs more than it cost to administer the entire Government twenty-five years after its organization. But it is not possible, so far as I can see, that there should be any matter of vast importance before these committees except the ordinary appropriation bills.

Mr. HULL. I have not claimed that the matters coming before the Committee on Military Affairs are of "vast importance." But we have before us a large number of bills of a class the investigation of which involves much time and trouble. As long as members introduce such bills and insist on hearings before the committee, insist on the records of parties in whom they are interested being looked up, the Committee on Military Affairs must at least do the best it can to meet the demands of members.

Mr. BAILEY. That is proper. Any gentleman who introduces a bill is entitled to a hearing upon it if he desires it.

Mr. HULL. I will say to the gentleman that something like 2,000 bills have already been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. If the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs were here, as he is not, I do not think anybody would like to object to this proposition. Gentlemen seem disposed to take advantage of an occasion when he is absent.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. I rose to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Accounts [Mr. ODELL] whether he has any knowledge in regard to the extra work which it is claimed has to be done by the Committee on Military Affairs. I should like to know something about the necessity for this extra work.

Mr. ODELL. In answer to the gentleman from Kansas, I can only say that representatives of the Committee on Naval Affairs have been before our committee two or three times—not before the full committee, but before individual members of it—urging that this clerk be allowed them on the ground that the committee has a great amount of work and that his services are necessary.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. Does the gentleman remember what suggestion was made as to the character of the work?

Mr. ODELL. No, sir. We have enough to do looking after the character of our own work without inquiring into the character of the work of other committees.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. It seems to me that this is one clerk that can be dispensed with.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I think that if gentlemen will wait until the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs comes in he will furnish all the information that is desired on this subject.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. I am very sorry he is not here. The House certainly ought to be informed as to the character of the extra labor which it is supposed requires the services of this extra clerk.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. Would it be in order to amend this resolution so as to strike out the clause providing an extra clerk for the Committee on Naval Affairs?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. ODELL] yields for such an amendment, it would be in order.

Mr. ODELL. I do not yield for that purpose. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY].

Mr. MOODY. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York whether three clerks are provided for the three different branches of the Committee on Elections?

Mr. ODELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MOODY. They are annual clerks?

Mr. ODELL. They are.

Mr. MOODY. I should like to know whether that action was taken after investigation of the amount of work to be performed.

Mr. ODELL. For an answer to that question I shall have to refer the gentleman to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MOODY. This question occurred to me when this bill was under consideration by the committee. It appears now that the Committee on Appropriations gave no attention to this matter. In point of fact, we did not look into the merits of these appropriations for clerk hire, supposing that attention would be given to them by some other committee.

Now some other committee reports on the subject-matter and assumes that the Committee on Appropriations have given it attention. In point of fact, Mr. Speaker, none of the committees have given it attention.

I wish to say here, from my experience on one of the divisions of the Committee on Elections in the last Congress, that apart from the work the clerks of the committees do for the chairmen of the committees (whose work ought to be provided for just as provision is made for the rest of the members of the House), apart from that fact and the work done in that connection, there is not enough clerical work in all three divisions of the Elections Committee to reasonably occupy the time of one man, and during the vacation there is absolutely nothing for these clerks to do.

I remember the complaint made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], the justice of which I now recognize, and of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] in the last Congress, that by the present system of appointing clerks, clerks to their committees were busy all the time in the preparation of public work, and that they were able to render little or no assistance in the individual work of the chairman of the committee such as is rendered to the other members of the House. It seems to me, in view of the fact that this subject will bear much closer scrutiny and more careful investigation, and the Committee on Appropriations having failed to give it consideration, and the Committee on Accounts having also failed to do so, that it ought to be investigated by some committee.

Several gentlemen, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] and others, made complaint during the last Congress, with reference to this subject, that the chairmen of committees—the great committees of the House—who have no other clerk than the one who renders public service as clerk to the committee are placed at a disadvantage. These gentlemen ought to be provided for in some manner, and the clerks who are clerks to committees without work ought to be cut out and the money go where it would do service in the transaction of the public business. I would like, therefore, to see this resolution withdrawn and let it be a little more carefully examined.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to state, if the gentleman from Massachusetts will allow me, so far as the Committee on Appropriations acted as to the current law in the last Congress by which provision was made for the allowance of clerks to each of the divisions of the Committee on Elections, that the allowance was made on a report of the Committee on Accounts, and was passed by the House, and was mandatory on the committee. We have, therefore, no discretion in the matter.

Mr. MOODY. I hope my friend from Pennsylvania, my colleague on the committee, will not understand me as undertaking to criticise him or the committee, for in doing so I would criticise myself. But I simply call the attention of the House to the fact that it is true this question has received no consideration whatever from any committee of the House, and it is a matter of so much importance that it should have some consideration, for which reason, as I have suggested, I hope it will be withdrawn and referred for an investigation and examination of the facts.

The gentleman from New York has insisted that in making the appropriations the committee having charge of the appropriation bill was exercising some kind of independent judgment in the matter. Now, I have insisted that that is not correct, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM], by the interpolation of his remarks, has insisted that the Committee on Appropriations made provision for these clerks in obedience to a report from some other committee.

Mr. ODELL. The gentleman is in error in saying that this recommendation came from the Committee on Accounts. That is the point.

Mr. BINGHAM. In the last Congress?

Mr. ODELL. In the last Congress.

Mr. BINGHAM. I may be in error as to the Committee on Accounts, but the resolution was adopted by the House at all events, and it became mandatory on the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ODELL. I do not object to that statement.

Mr. MOODY. Whatever may be the reason, the subject has not been considered by any committee, and I regret that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLER], the chairmen of these committees, are not present. I thought I saw the gentleman from Indiana when I rose to speak, or I should not have called attention to this particular subject.

But it is perfectly true that the employment of three annual clerks to dispose of the election cases is an absolute waste of the public money. It is true that denying to chairmen of the larger committees the clerks accorded to other members is an injustice to them; but if the matter were considered as the Committee on Accounts no doubt would be able to do, no longer relying on the judgment of any other committee, some plan could be adopted that would tend to prevent a wasteful expenditure of the public money and at the same time do justice to all of the committees.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. ODELL] to yield to me.

Mr. ODELL. For what purpose?

Mr. DOCKERY. For the purpose of making an observation or two. [Laughter.] I desire to indorse what has been said by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY], and to pronounce a criticism upon the assignment of committee clerks under the authority of the legislative bill; not with the hope of effecting any reform at this time, but in the belief that possibly it may be of service to the Committee on Accounts in the future. In the assignment of the eighteen clerks authorized by the legislative bill, I find one assigned to the Committee on Education, which committee is absolutely without public business; one to the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands. When did that committee have any business before this House? One to the Committee on Mines and Mining, which is utterly without public business before it. One to the Committee on Private Land Claims. I do not suppose that committee has had a meeting for years, unless it is to authorize the chairman to appoint a clerk. One to the Committee on Railways and Canals. I am not criticising the assignment proposed in the resolution now pending.

Mr. ODELL. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. DOCKERY. I am in harmony with the views just submitted by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY]. I think possibly some of these great committees do need a little additional assistance. I do not know whether these committees do or not, but I do know that the committees that I have named, to whom clerks have been assigned by this report, have no public business, and that clerical force, it seems to me, could more properly have gone to the committees which are now asking for assistant clerks.

Mr. ODELL. I will say to the gentleman from Missouri that if there had been no assignment of these clerks, each chairman would have had a personal clerk anyway, and I call his attention to the fact that the amount carried is not very large, when you come to figure out the difference, and when you consider that the clerk takes care of the personal work of the chairman as well as the committee work.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. May I ask the gentleman in charge of the bill a question?

Mr. ODELL. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Is it not a fact that the legislation which provided for clerks to members makes an exception as to chairmen of committees?

Mr. ODELL. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. And therefore those members who get to be chairmen of these little committees are thereby deprived of their clerks.

Mr. ODELL. Not altogether; only during the session of Congress.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. During the recess of Congress. And if they were not allowed committee clerks, they would get individual clerks under the general law.

Mr. ODELL. Let me make a correction. I think my statement is not understood. During the recess of Congress the chairmen of committees who have only session clerks are deprived of the services of the committee clerks, because the session clerk dies with Congress. The chairman then has his personal clerk the same as any other member.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. If these members were not chairmen of committees, they would have clerks under the law.

Mr. ODELL. Yes; they would have clerks.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Let me ask you another question. Is it not a fact that every time this question comes before the House it is always discussed; that the chairmen of these various committees who are allowed clerks are scarcely any of them here, and it has generally resulted about as is exhibited in your report?

Mr. ODELL. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. And it seems to have been the practice of the House for some time to allow these clerks, and there is no reason why they should not have them.

Mr. ODELL. We have followed the recommendation of the Committee on Accounts in the Fifty-fourth Congress without making one change.

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly.

Mr. ODELL. I yield to the gentleman from New York, my colleague [Mr. CUMMINGS].

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, I was among the first in this House to vote for clerks for members. That proposition was carried several times in Committee of the Whole, but when a yea-and-nay vote was reached in open House 25 per cent of the members who had voted in Committee of the Whole for clerks turned tail and voted against the proposition.

Finally, however, the proposition was carried in the Fifty-second Congress. In the Fifty-third Congress I found myself chairman of the Naval Committee, with no clerk. There was a clerk for the committee, but no clerk for the chairman of the committee. The time of the clerk of the Committee on Naval Affairs was more than taken up by his duties in the committee. A resolution was brought before the House providing for an assistant clerk for the Naval Committee. It entailed considerable debate in this body, but was finally carried by a decisive majority. At that time there was in the Naval Committee, in addition to its regular work, an investigation into the speed premium business, an investigation as to the Geodetic Survey, and an investigation as to the armor plate; and, sir, the time not only of the clerk, but of the assistant clerk of that committee, was so much taken up that I was compelled at times to hire a clerk and pay him out of my own pocket to attend to private business.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I know, and every man who has ever served upon the Committee on Naval Affairs knows, that there is an absolute necessity for an assistant clerk there independent of the business of the chairman. That clerk can be used by the chairman as his own clerk at odd times. If you strike out the provision for the assistant clerk of that committee, the chairman will be compelled to pay for a clerk out of his own pocket, while every other member upon this floor enjoys the advantage of having one granted to him by the House.

Mr. BLAND. I want to ask the gentleman if he did not make a mistake when he said that he had paid for a clerk to attend to his private business. I suppose he meant his public business.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I mean public business unconnected with naval matters—pension matters and business of similar character.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from New York will permit me, I raised some question as to the propriety of these additional clerks, because if they are not necessary I desire to vote against them, and if they are necessary I would be one of the last men here or elsewhere to deny the committees the clerks necessary. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL], has said that it is necessary for his committee, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JETT] and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY], who sit around me, say it is necessary. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] says an assistant is necessary to the Committee on Naval Affairs. With these statements, I have no further objection.

Mr. ODELL. I can say to the gentleman from Texas that the Committee on Accounts have given to this subject very careful consideration; that we are very loath to make any recommendation to this House for expenditures unless we believe they are absolutely necessary. We make this recommendation because we believe the committees need this assistance.

Mr. BAILEY. I am sure of that from what I know of the gentleman from New York [Mr. ODELL] and his associates on this committee; but still I think the House ought to understand perfectly well that the necessity exists before a clerk is allowed.

Mr. ODELL. I ask for the previous question.

Mr. MOODY. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment. I do not wish to add very much to what I have said. I want it understood that I am in favor of giving adequate clerk hire to all committees and adequate clerk hire to all members; but I am opposed to going on in this slipshod, irresponsible way, without doing justice to the members and to the different committees. What ought to be done, and what has been suggested by a gentleman sitting near me, is this: Every member upon this floor ought to be furnished with a personal clerk, because I believe there is nothing better expended for the interests and convenience of our constituents than the money which is expended for clerk hire. After that each committee ought to have such clerical force as the duties of that committee demand, and no more. If the duties of the committee demand the assistance of one, two, or three assistant clerks, that number should be granted, and if their duties demand no clerks, they should have no clerks.

The SPEAKER. The Chair ventures to suggest to members of the Committee on Accounts that they should make an examination of this matter in reference to the needs of the House and in reference to the change that has been made by the creation of clerks for members. This has evidently disarranged the old system, and a new one ought to be established. The Chair has no doubt that the Committee on Accounts would be glad if every member who feels an interest in the subject would embody his views in a resolution or bill and send it to them, so that they may prepare and present some measure concerning the administration of the House.

Mr. MOODY. A parliamentary inquiry. What is the parliamentary status of the resolution before the House?

The SPEAKER. The resolution is now before the House for its adoption.

Mr. MOODY. Would it be in order to move to recommit the resolution?

Mr. ODELL. Mr. Speaker, I yielded to the gentleman for a question, and not for a motion, and I decline to yield for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. ODELL. I move the previous question.

The question was taken; and the previous question was ordered.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, at the proper time I desire to be recognized for a motion to recommit. I think I have that right under the rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves to recommit the resolution.

The question was taken; and the motion to recommit was rejected.

The question was taken on the passage of the resolution; and it was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. ODELL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

USE OF ALCOHOL IN THE ARTS.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, I present the report of the Joint Select Committee on the Use of Alcohol in the Arts and Manufactures.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, was I not recognized for the purpose of making a report?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized, unless the gentleman from Pennsylvania, representing the Committee on Appropriations, persists in his motion.

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, I present the report of the joint select committee on questions relating to the use of alcohol in the manufactures and arts free of tax. (Printed as Senate Report No. 411.) As this is quite an important subject, I ask the unanimous consent of the House that as many copies of the report may be printed as can be printed under the rule.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, before that unanimous consent is granted, I desire to ask the gentleman if it is a unanimous report, or are there any views of the minority to be presented?

Mr. EVANS. The report itself is a unanimous report, but embraces as part of it the separate views of each member of the committee except one, who has not presented any. The papers all go together.

Mr. BAILEY. And the one who has not joined in the report, does he desire to present any views on the subject?

Mr. EVANS. I think not.

Mr. BAILEY. If he does, I think his views ought to be incorporated as well as those of the other members.

Mr. EVANS. I think he does not desire to present his individual views.

The SPEAKER. Is the report accompanied by a bill?

Mr. EVANS. It is not.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the report will be printed as a document of the House. If it is not accompanied by a bill and is not for action, the Chair does not see how it can be referred to any calendar, and therefore it must be printed as a House document.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, we should like to have as many copies printed as may be printed under the rule.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the gentleman from Kentucky desires unanimous consent that, in addition to the usual number, there shall be printed as many copies as may be printed under the rules for the use of members. The document is a very important one and undoubtedly there will be a considerable demand for it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent for the printing of the largest number of copies of this report that may be printed under the rules of the House and the law. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

GOVERNMENT ARMOR FACTORY.

Mr. BROWNLOW. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolution which I send to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas the Secretary of the Navy having forwarded to the House of Representatives on December 6, 1897, the report of the armor factory board, concerning the establishment of a Government armor factory; and

Whereas it appears from said report that no reference is made to the board's visit South, and its investigations of the advantages of that section as a suitable location for the proposed Government armor factory: Now, therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby requested to cause to be prepared and to forward to the House the data gathered by the armor factory board during its trip through the South concerning the advantages claimed by that section as a suitable location for the proposed Government armor factory.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a resolution on the same subject which will embrace somewhat more territory than is covered by the one just read.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will the gentleman from Tennessee consent to have his resolution amended so as to include a report of the visit made to Illinois?

Mr. STEELE. My resolution includes that.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire that the resolution of the gentleman from Tennessee be referred under the rule.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a substitute for the resolution, which can go to the committee also.

The substitute was read, as follows:

Whereas the Secretary of the Navy having forwarded to the House of Representatives, on December 6, 1897, the report of the armor factory board concerning the establishment of a Government armor plant; and

Whereas it appears from said report that a great many places have been recommended as sites for the location of the proposed Government armor factory: Now, therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby requested to address circular letters to the boards of trade or chambers of commerce of all places that have been recommended as sites for the proposed Government armor factory, and that have not already forwarded data on said subject, soliciting statements from each place concerning its advantages, in answer to the same questions propounded by the armor factory board during its trip through the South.

And be it further resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby requested to cause to be prepared and forward to the House all the data gathered by the armor factory board during its trip through the South concerning the advantages claimed by places in that section as suitable locations for the proposed Government armor factory, together with all information concerning other places obtained in compliance with the foregoing resolutions.

The resolution and the proposed substitute were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for further consideration of the legislative appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. HOPKINS in the chair.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for further consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For rent of office for the surveyor-general, fuel, books, stationery, and other incidental expenses, $1,200.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of saying that when I made a motion a while ago in the House to recommit the resolution in relation to additional clerks I acted under misapprehension as to the scope of the resolution. I had no desire to modify the particular resolution which was then pending before the House. I withdraw the motion to strike out.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of Assistant Attorney-General for the Post-Office Department: Law clerk, $2,500; one clerk of class 4; one clerk of class 3; one clerk of class 2; two clerks of class 1; assistant messenger; in all, $10,420.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I send to the Clerk's desk a protest of the North American Gymnastic Union, which I desire to have read. It relates to the pending immigration bill.

The protest was read, as follows:

NORTH AMERICAN TURNER BUND (GYMNASTIC UNION),
St. Louis, Mo., December, 1897.

To the Congress of the United States:

Again the North American Gymnastic Union, an organization of some 40,000 American citizens, distributed through almost every State of this Union, is called upon, through its undersigned executive officers, to protest against the passage by your honorable body of proposed measures intended to seriously restrict or altogether suspend immigration from other civilized nations to our once hospitable country.

It will not be denied that now existing laws entirely suffice to bar any really undesirable addition to our population, such as the sick, the criminal, or the actually poor; but it is proposed now, on the score of imaginary protection against competition in the field of industrial labor, to go far beyond former limitations and place a practical embargo upon the admission of "willing workers" (both male and female) from all other lands, and to prevent them from applying their strong hands in the development of our boundless and almost untouched resources.

We can not be deceived by the allurements of the so-called "educational test." How many of the founders of this Republic (all of them immigrants, or the direct descendants of such) would have been unable to read, copy, or interpret "five lines of the Constitution?" How much mean and manual labor is not required in the development of your country's wealth which the lineal descendants of the Pilgrim Fathers are unwilling to perform, and which must be performed by brawn and not by learning?

The great and growing West, with its vast fund of undeveloped agricultural and mineral resources, is most disastrously affected by this species of legislation. A year's restriction of its accustomed accession to capital in the form of willing labor would signify to it a decade of retrogression. It is no answer to say that the tendency of the modern immigrant has been to settle in and about the ports of entry, instead of seeking the more distant fields of usefulness. Lawful and reasonable means can be taken for diffusing immigration, without stopping it altogether.

It is a matter of record that there has been a sharp decline in immigration during the several years last past, especially from those countries whence the best educated additions to our population have come. This can be explained upon one of two suppositions. Either the inimical and nativistic spirit displayed by our actual or proposed legislation has deterred the sensitive and self-respecting (while no apparent hindrance to the less desirable alien), or else this question is at last controlled by the natural law of supply and demand.

Certain it is that the industrial depression resting upon this country during that same period has been in no wise relieved or affected by the decrease, and no excuse for the proposed Draconian measures can be drawn from that direction. It is equally certain that with reviving industrial enterprises, and a stimulated productiveness in our fields, there will be an ever-growing demand for more and better labor, as well as for a larger population to consume what has been produced.

It is our firm conviction that no surer means of creating and continuing a general and disastrous stagnation could be invented than the proposed erection of a Chinese wall of intolerance against the introduction of new life into our body politic.

Yet more powerful than these economic objections are the reasons against the proposed illiberal measures, based on principle and history.

This country was made by the immigrant and his immediate descendants. Great cities have arisen and the vast wilderness has been transformed into a garden by his thrift and industry. Whenever this country has been threatened by any foe, he has been found in the front rank of its defenders. This was so only because the Union had stood true to its declared purpose of shielding and protecting those who had sought its shores as the haven of human liberty.

Surely it is as reprehensible to-day as it was in 1776 to pass laws "to prevent the population of these States" and to refuse "to pass others to encourage the migration of foreigners hither."

The undersigned, and the mighty host of those who sympathize with our efforts to maintain the liberal spirit in which this country was founded, do respectfully but earnestly petition you to refrain from passing the illiberal and oppressive measures that are again to be urged before you, and, believing that the position which they occupy is sound in principle, they will persevere in that position, and, whenever occasion permits, emphasize their conviction by the consistent and firm use of the ballot.

Respectfully submitted.

THE NATIONAL EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF THE N. A. T. B., HENRY BRAUN, President.
C. G. RATHMANN, Secretary.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, in connection with this protest, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD some newspaper editorials relating to the same subject, which will not occupy much space.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The newspaper extracts are as follows:

RESTRICTION OF IMMIGRATION—VIEWS EXPRESSED BY THE GERMAN-AMERICAN PRESS AND GERMAN SOCIETIES ON THE "EDUCATIONAL-TEST BILL."

RESTRICTION OF IMMIGRATION.

[New York Staats Zeitung, December 6, 1897.]

We do not hesitate to characterize the bill for the restriction of immigration as the most objectionable of all measures which are expected to be passed by the Congress about to convene. It is a genuine piece of demagogism. A scapegoat is needed for the bad results of the economic development of the country, under which the workingmen have suffered, though the depressing effects were due partly to blunders in the economic policy of our Government, partly to the mistakes and sins of the system of production all over the world.

Now, a measure for the restriction of immigration by means of an educational test is brought forth as a panacea. The ability to read and copy a passage from the United States Constitution—which is just about as easy to understand for an immigrant as though it were Sanscrit—is to be made the standard by which the desirability of a male or female immigrant in this country is to be measured. And this is to be done after millions of immigrants who could never have fulfilled such a requirement have helped to make this country great and rich and prosperous.

Yet it may be true that at present there is or lately has been a surplus of laboring men in our country, for the very reason that the economic conditions are or were abnormal. Very well; under such conditions the influx of foreign labor is arrested automatically, especially when more favorable conditions divert it into other channels.

It may also be true that certain classes of workingmen do not fit into our social system. As far as this is due to racial differences, the exclusion of such undesirable races may be defensible. But such objections do not affect the European immigrants, all of whom assimilate with the American population within a comparatively short space of time. That is well known to everyone who has studied this question at all. European immigrants who come here voluntarily as a rule are in possession of a desire as well as the ability to work. They are able to support themselves and to assist effectively in the development of the resources of this country. Such immigration furnishes not only producers, but consumers as well. It does not only take but also gives employment. Individual cases of undesirable immigration can not be made to serve as a test for the treatment of all immigration. Undesirable individuals may be kept out by the special provisions of law, which have long been in force.

An educational test—more particularly the one referred to above—would have a deterring influence upon immigrants of both sexes; it would divide families in the most cruel manner. It would seem incomprehensible that anyone familiar with President Cleveland's veto could have revived such a senseless proposition.

If an educational test is to precede the acquisition of political rights, it may be introduced for such purposes, but for natives as well as immigrants. The citizens of foreign birth, least of all, deny that a large percentage of the population of this country is not fitted for the exercise of such rights or for the performance of political duties.

If educational tests offer the means of improvement in this direction, well enough; let us have them. If, however, workingmen and working girls, willing to devote their vigor, their abilities, and energy to the performance of labors which the natives or better situated older inhabitants will not or can not perform, are refused admission to this country because they are not able to read or copy the Constitution, that is confirmed idiocy.

But it is more than that. It is a stupid, malicious slur, which an element, boastful of their native birth, hiding behind the pretense of protecting American labor, casts on all immigration, old or recent; and this pretense is just as deceitful; it plays just as much on the gullibility of the American workingman as that more ancient pretense, that tariff barriers should protect these workingmen, while as a matter of fact the condition of our industries and of the working classes behind these barriers offer the most conclusive evidence of the absolute hollowness of such assertions.

The foreign-born population have felt this latest insult, heaped upon them by the American nativists, this parody on nobility by birth, whose haughty conceit is not relieved by any redeeming feature, and indications are not lacking that the foreign-born citizens will, in due time, avenge this insult. Members of Congress who want to give us a new Lodge bill do this at their own risk. The German-American press has lifted its voice and indignantly rejects the assurances that such a measure is not directed against German immigration, but is meant to exclude Italians, Slovaks, Russians, and the like. The German-American press contends for the solidarity of the interests of all European immigration, and Congressmen who persist in joining this crusade of nativism against such immigration will be held responsible at the ballot box.

THE MOVEMENT AMONG THE GERMANS AGAINST THE ADOPTION OF NATIVISTIC LAWS FOR THE RESTRICTION OF IMMIGRATION IS GAINING IN STRENGTH.

In view of the efforts of fanatical nativists favoring the passage of laws for the further restriction of immigration, the Germans of Pittsburg have not remained inactive. The Turnverein of Allegheny, one of the oldest societies belonging to the North American Turnerbund, at its last meeting took energetic action on the question of immigration. The society resolved to formulate, in terms not open to misconstruction, a protest against the passage of any laws for the further restriction of immigration. This protest is to be sent, together with a statement of the reasons, to the Congressmen and United States Senators representing this State for their information and proper action.

It was further resolved to send copies of the protest to the several German societies of Allegheny County, in order that these associations might also forward protest to their respective representatives in the legislature.

During the session a number of extracts from German-American newspapers were read, in which it was urged that the German element should lift its voice against all further narrow-minded nativistic laws. The members of the Turnverein of Allegheny believe that the immigration laws now in force suffice to keep away undesirable elements.

BIRDS OF PASSAGE.

[From the Milwaukee Herald, Republican.]

The Immigration Restriction League, whose headquarters are located in Boston, had the kindness to supply us with a circular in which the newspapers of the country are requested to vigorously work for the passage of a law by Congress enforcing an educational test for immigrants. With many thanks for the kind attention, we assure the league, in the person of its secretary, Mr. Prescott F. Hall, that we shall do our best in behalf of the other side.

The circular contains at the same time the avowal that the enemies of immigration will not insist any longer on the adoption of the whole Lodge bill, which President Cleveland vetoed. They want to abandon the so-called "Corliss amendment," relating to the "birds of passage," a name given to people who come temporarily to this country to engage in some kind of a trade and then go back to their own country. Among these we may count Italians, Greeks, and others, many of whom come over for a short time and return to their homes with a few hard-earned dollars. The amendment proposed by the Detroit Representative, Mr. CORLISS, was aimed mainly against the Canadian workingmen who came daily from Windsor and other Canadian places to Detroit to earn their daily wages. The authors of this measure relied chiefly upon the supposed shortsightedness of the American workingmen to swallow this bait. Even at that time the business men of Detroit warned Mr. CORLISS that his measure was a double-edged sword. As also many American workingmen found work on the Canadian side, a corresponding measure was to be expected from the Dominion authorities. This conviction has dawned upon the good people of the Restriction League, since American gold seekers go to Klondike, and this is why they want to drop the amendment. The emigration of our own citizens to Klondike across the Northwestern frontier renders the law forbidding the temporary stay of Canadians in this country an unwise and useless measure.

"There are other questions between Canada and the United States," says the circular, "which make it appear advisable to postpone the Corliss amendment or to incorporate it into another bill." In other words: Aye, my man, this now is a horse of a different color. Very true. If we are apt to get the worst of it, we had better not start the row. In this matter the gentlemen have come readily to their senses. It may not be quite so easy with the educational test.

SIGNS OF LIFE.

[From the Davenport, Iowa, Democrat.]

For fifteen or twenty years demagogues have been able to deceive the great masses of workingmen by the make-believe statement that the wretched condition of the American labor market was mainly due to the competition created by immigrants. Besides the high tariff duties on foreign imports, measures for the restriction of immigration were to bring about improved conditions. In the first place the Chinese were excluded, and by degrees the same policy was directed against the entire European immigration, the influx of which was to be checked by various laws of a more or less stringent nature.

These laws only partially fulfilled the expectations. The better, more intelligent immigrants were kept away from a country which had assumed such a narrow-minded attitude, scorning all former traditions, while the so-called "undesirable immigration" decreased but imperceptibly, as large American employers of workingmen, placing their pecuniary interests above patriotism, infringed the laws against importation of foreign contract labor.

Although immigration has notably decreased in the last few years, this does not yet satisfy the "patriots" by far, and they fain would prohibit it altogether. The Knights of Labor, under Powderly and Sovereign, have worked hard to this end, and the Federation of Labor, while generally representing more liberal views, did not wish to remain behind its rival.

Cowardly political pot hunters joined the apparently popular movement with the same zeal as some forty years ago they fell in with greenbackism and lately with the silver craze, for the purpose of rising to political prominence. Congress will again take up the question of restricting immigration, and history will repeat itself.

Under these circumstances it is highly gratifying that the workingmen have recognized the folly of immigrant baiting, and that a wholesome reaction against such demagogism is spreading among them.

The National Federation of Labor, at the head of which we see that foe of immigration, Samuel Gompers, himself an immigrant to this country, had adopted at its last annual meeting resolutions favoring the restriction of immigration. These resolutions, however will be voted upon separately by each of the trades unions ere the national body, meeting at Nashville next week, takes further steps in the matter. The resolutions came up for discussion Sunday last in the Central Trades and Labor Union at St. Louis, a body representing 60 different trades, and altogether 20,000 workingmen. There it was rejected by 41 votes against 5. Most of the speakers, German as well as American, agreed on that point, that the politicians were trying to throw dust into the eyes of the workingmen when asserting their apparent friendliness, and that the proposition to restrict immigration was but a snare.

Among the many hundreds of thousands of members of workingmen's organizations in the whole country there are certainly a great many who heartily agree with our views, but who so far have left the field to the bullies and loud-mouthed agitators, permitting them to bawl away in the name of organized labor. These, perhaps, will now find the courage to take a stand against the demagogical agitation which seeks to keep out foreigners and immigrants.

THE QUESTION OF IMMIGRATION.

[From the St. Louis Amerika.]

The Central Trades and Labor Union of St. Louis has expressed its opinion on the question of immigration in such a manner that there is no doubt left on the fact that these very spokesmen of the working classes, who want to see immigration at least restricted, if not wholly suppressed, do not lead any workingmen at all, but, on the contrary, by these very exactions, place themselves in exact opposition to the workingmen.

The St. Louis resolution says:

"It is not by immigration laws but by international organizations that we can prevent the large corporations from importing foreign workingmen.

"We declare that the now-existing immigration laws, if properly and conscientiously carried out, suffice for the protection of the interests of American workingmen.

"We declare that the present agitation in favor of further restriction of immigration is in direct opposition to the progressive spirit of this country—steam power and electricity. In this agitation we recognize a reactionary effort to check the progressive movement of the workingmen of all countries struggling for their final liberation.

"We declare that immigration is not responsible for the present condition of American workingmen, nor for the general depression of commerce and trade in this or any other country. Each wage worker must acknowledge the fact that the commercial and industrial crises from which our country has been suffering for several years are the natural results of certain economic conditions and circumstances, and that these very conditions may, in a near future, bring about new crises, no matter whether immigration be completely prohibited or not.

"We declare that without the immigration of the last forty years our American Republic could never have risen to the economic, commercial, and political level which to-day it occupies among the nations of the world.

"We declare that the workingmen of this country, considered as a class, can not have any interest in surrounding America with a Chinese wall, which undoubtedly would restrain the free development of true civilization and the realization of those noble principles which have been expressed in the American declaration of liberty.

"We declare that the system of industrial production for profit has brought about the present regrettable conditions, and that it is our duty as wage workers to ascertain and remove the real causes of this misery.

"Such is our position in regard to the question of immigration. This is also the reason why we must answer the question whether we approve further restriction of immigration by a decisive 'no.'"

The Philadelphia Tageblatt comments on the foregoing resolutions as follows:

"Such declarations are highly commendable and should be generally adopted. The politicians are now under the impression that the working classes of this country have decided in favor of prohibitive measures against immigration, and will act accordingly. They should be enlightened on this point, for such is not the case. We are thoroughly opposed to a specifically German agitation, such as Dr. Senner wants to inaugurate in New York; that could do more harm than good. The restriction of immigration is represented to be a measure in favor of American workingmen, therefore the workingmen must oppose this fictitious claim.

Such agitation naturally falls to the lot of the socialists and the progressive trade organizations. Declarations of central bodies and of large mass meetings, in which English speakers should take leading parts, are to be commended. The resolutions ought to be sent to Congress. An extensive agitation of this character may lead to success."

We can but give our full approval to the views expressed by the St. Louis resolution and the comments added by the Philadelphia Tageblatt. The organized workingmen owe it to themselves to refute the calumny with which they have been aspersed by certain "leaders."

THE QUESTION OF IMMIGRATION.

[From the Baker's Journal.]

It seems that the zealous champions of further restriction of immigration have but one aim before them—that of diverting the attention of the workingmen from their real interests. While Powderly stirs the wealthy class into pleasant emotions by his pompous declarations against immigrants with "dangerous foreign ideas," he quietly allows thousands of Chinamen to settle among us in violation of laws which he is called upon to enforce. While he is concocting long epistles against the Slavs, the Hungarians, and Italians who are brought over by "irresponsible" steamship lines, the laws against introduction of contract labor are but insufficiently carried out.

It is astounding to see so many leaders of workingmen pose as experts in this question. They are capable of making speeches, read statistics by the yard, like professors of political economy, and all this to prove that the "ignorant foreigners," the element which does not wish to "assimilate"—those who come to this country for the purpose of accumulating money and carrying it back to Europe—must be kept away from our shores.

Those who have never seen any but their own native country are generally so prejudiced in her favor that they do not only consider her institutions perfect, but, furthermore, her population the most enlightened and the one occupying the highest level. However, we would come nearer to the truth by saying that intelligence is equally distributed among the civilized nations of the world, and that the standard of perfection of each individual people will always differ from the rest of them. As to school education, which is highly overrated by many, John Selden, the great English scholar and statesman of the seventeenth century, has justly said:

"No man becomes wiser through school education, and no fool is a complete fool before he has learned Latin."

During the last mining strike the Slavs, Hungarians, and Italians possessed sufficient intelligence to stand up and fight shoulder to shoulder with their coworkers of other nationalities. Their behavior was so reasonable and irreproachable, their sentiment of justice so sharply defined, their methods were distinguished by such prudence and reflection, that the owners of mines and their wretched attendants could not find any other means than to brutally murder thirteen of them.

It is, however, but five or six years ago that these people landed in this country and were classified as ignorant foreigners. If such men are to be kept from coming to this country, is there any reason why not every other workingman should be refused? In our own trade we have succeeded in organizing the Italians and Russian Jews, while the Frenchmen and Swedes could not be moved to unite for their own benefit. Yet the trades unions demand from the Government that the country should be closed against the former, while the latter are termed desirable immigrants.

The peculiar catchword of the day is, however, that the undesirable immigrants do not assimilate, i. e., do not mix with the native population, and are not absorbed by it. Our statisticians do not speak here in the interests of the workingmen, but apparently in the name of the nation. They have grown to be statesmen. As such they have their ideals of an American nation, and their pride is wounded when they come into parts of cities or whole villages which are inhabited by an exclusively foreign population. As statesmen, they ought to know that assimilation, which they think so important, takes a long time for its realization.

Worst of all is the man who comes here to accumulate money and who returns afterwards to his own home. He does not spend his money in this country, does not think of acquiring citizenship and of sharing the fate of our country. Who can love or respect such a man? But shall we on his account prevent the honest workingman, to whom political and industrial servitude has become insufferable in his own country, to seek refuge in this wealthy land, a land which is capable of sustaining a population six times as large as the present one? Still, a word can also be said in the favor of him who earns a few dollars, packs up his belongings, and bids farewell to the country which gave him the opportunity of earning them.

During his stay in this country he did not live on the earnings of others, but, by the sweat of his brow, has created values, but a small part of which he could appropriate in the shape of wages. By his hard work he has helped to make our country more habitable, and to increase our national wealth. But there is a class of citizens among us, some of them born here and some of foreign extraction, who are not engaged in any useful work and still live in luxury. They are the curse of the country. It is here, in our midst, that we have to look for the cause of the sufferings of American workingmen. As long as the workingman's attention is rivited on demands like the restriction of immigration, etc., that class of drones will be able to live comfortably on the fruit of his labors.

Let us insist upon the enforcement of the laws against the importation of contract labor, but let us open hospitably our gates to each honest worker who is willing and capable of earning his living.

A HINT TO GOMPERS.

[From the Pittsburg Freiheitsfreund.]

The trades unions of St. Louis belonging to the American Federation of Labor, by imposing majority, have declared against all further restriction of immigration by new laws, and have instructed accordingly their delegates to the next annual convention of the Federation. Bravo! It is to be hoped that the president of this union, who is an immigrant himself, but who did not hesitate to go to Washington, as a "representative of the workingmen," to influence President McKinley in favor of the Lodge bill, will, in this convention, be thoroughly enlightened upon the matter by thinking delegates.

OPPOSITION AGAINST NATIVISM.

The German Liederkranz (one of the most powerful German-American societies of New York), at its last meeting, adopted the following resolutions against the restriction of immigration:

"According to the unanimous reports of the press, it is proposed to pass immediately at the beginning of the next session of Congress a law for the radical restriction of immigration to the United States. This law, allegedly for the protection of American workingmen, is intended to introduce an educational test which is to be enforced upon every male or female immigrant having attained the age of 16 years.

"Whereas we have laws sufficient to exclude undesirable immigrants; that the enforcement of such an educational test is thoroughly improper and would bring about serious economic evils; that the difficulties and vexations involved in the practical application of such an educational test would deter even the best classes of immigrants, those even who can pass the examination; and

"Whereas this wholly unnecessary new force law, being in direct opposition to the best interests of the country and its foreign-born population, would lead to a complete suspension of voluntary and desirable immigration; we declare—

"1. That the German Liederkranz should express a solemn and energetic protest against the proposed radical restriction of immigration.

"2. That the German Liederkranz cherishes the hope that all other German societies in the United States will also assume an energetic attitude in this important question touching upon their existence.

"3. That the German Liederkranz empowers its officers to take all proper and legitimate steps against the proposed law."

LET ALL COME WHO WILL.

The New York Eichenkranz declares against the narrow-minded restriction of immigration.

The example of the Liederkranz was followed last night, December 3, by the Eichenkranz, a society always foremost in the fight against nativists and hypocrites.

Last night, President Theodore Krueger presiding, the following resolutions against the proposed restriction of immigration were adopted on motion of Mr. Gunther Thomas:

"Whereas it is known that a new effort will soon be made in Congress to bring about measures for the restriction of immigration, by means of which insurmountable obstacles will be thrown in the way of really desirable immigration; and

"Whereas the laws now existing are amply sufficient to keep away or send back those immigrants who are found to be undesirable, the passage of further laws is entirely superfluous; and

"Whereas these inimical efforts against immigration are apparently founded on a tender solicitude for the American workingman, in reality, however, on nativistic hatred of all foreigners; and

"Whereas, further, those nativistic aspirations are fraught with the danger that hypocritical and puritanical elements may triumph over the freedom of action, of work, and lastly the freedom of thought of all the inhabitants of this country,

"Be it resolved by the Eichenkranz, To protest against all further restriction of immigration, and to join every movement directed against such nativistic and un-American tendencies, which are unworthy of the United States. Full power is given to the officers to take any steps for this purpose which they may deem proper and advisable."

The resolution was received and adopted with great enthusiasm.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Protests against the further restriction of immigration also appeared in the editorial columns of the St. Louis Westliche Post, the leading German Republican paper of this country; of the St. Louis Anzeiger, the Cincinnati Volksblatt, the Cincinnati Freie Presse, the Louisville Anzeiger, the Illinois Staats-Zeitung, and nearly all other influential German daily papers of the country. The German press, irrespective of party, is unanimous in its opposition to any further restriction of immigration.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 102, line 9, where I desire to offer an amendment.

There was no objection.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 9, page 102, strike out the word "two," so that it will read "bearing date four years prior to date of destruction." Also, on page 102, line 7, strike out the words "ninety-six" and insert "ninety-four."

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, there is no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Commissioner Yellowstone Park: For salary of commissioner in Yellowstone National Park, $1,000. And the provisions of section 21 of an act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes, approved May 28, 1896, shall not be construed as impairing the right of said commissioner to receive the salary authorized to be paid him by the act to protect the birds and animals in the Yellowstone Park and to punish crimes in said park, approved May 7, 1894.

Mr. HUNTER. I should like to inquire of the gentleman in charge of this bill what the real compensation of the commissioner of the Yellowstone Park is? It seems to be made up of several items. This officer is charged in certain respects with the exercise of judicial powers; and it seems to be contemplated that a part of his compensation shall be the fees received in this way.

Mr. BINGHAM. The salary of the commissioner of Yellowstone Park is, as indicated in the bill, $1,000.

Mr. HUNTER. But it seems that he is to be paid for other services in connection with the discharge of his duties, the compensation for which is not expressed on the face of this bill, reference being made to previous laws authorizing certain payments of fees. I should like to know what his real compensation is.

Mr. DOCKERY. I can explain this matter to the gentleman. By the act which took effect July 1, 1896, there was made a general revision of the fees paid to commissioners of the United States. That revision operated to reduce fees. The provision in this bill is designed to give to this commissioner a salary of $1,000, in lieu of all fees, because his duties are special and important.

Mr. HUNTER. The fees, then, would amount to about $1,000?

Mr. DOCKERY. Well, that is very doubtful. Under this provision he will get no fees at all, but will receive $1,000 in lieu of fees.

Mr. HUNTER. But the language of this bill is that—

The provisions of section 21 of an act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes, approved May 28, 1896, shall not be construed as impairing the right of said commissioner to receive the salary authorized to be paid him by the act to protect the birds and animals in the Yellowstone Park and to punish crimes in said park, approved May 7, 1894.

That, I take it, refers to the fees to be paid this officer for exercising some other functions than those belonging to his regular duties.

Mr. DOCKERY. Oh, no; the gentleman is wholly in error. The general act referred to gives to United States commissioners certain fees. We do not desire this act to apply to the commissioner for the Yellowstone Park, because it would be impossible for him to sustain himself more than thirty days in the year on the limited fees that he receives. Besides, the law fixes his salary at $1,000; and by the provision in the bill we simply mean that, so far as this particular commissioner is concerned, he having special oversight and care of this park, we do not propose to disturb his compensation.

Mr. HUNTER. Then it seems to me if he receives only $1,000 the compensation is not adequate for the service he is required to render.

Mr. DOCKERY. Well, there has been no difficulty in finding gentlemen willing to take the office at this compensation.

Mr. HUNTER. I suppose that is true, when men have to raise corn at 20 cents a bushel.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask unanimous consent for the adoption of the proposition which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the following provisions in the bill be transposed to the end of the bill and numbered consecutively as separate sections thereof, as follows:

Lines 12 to 19, inclusive, on page 21, to be section 3.

Lines 19 to 24, inclusive, on page 25, and lines 1 and 2 on page 26, to be section 4.

Lines 6 to 11, inclusive, on page 33, to be section 5.

Lines 19 to 25, inclusive, on page 70, and lines 1 to 16, inclusive, on page 71, to be section 6.

Lines 18 to 25, inclusive, on page 88, all of page 89, and lines 1 to 21, inclusive, on page 90, to be section 7.

The matter inserted by amendment, after line 24, on page 90, relating to the clerk of the Supreme Court, to be section 8.

Lines 1 to 6, inclusive, on page 101, to be section 9.

Lines 7 to 25, inclusive, on page 101, together with lines 1 to 9, inclusive, on page 102, to be section 10.

That the present section 3 of the bill be numbered 11.

That the Clerk be authorized to correct totals of paragraphs in the bill to conform to amendments adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of objection, the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be regarded as adopted.

There was no objection.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, one of the Representatives from South Dakota [Mr. KNOWLES] desires at this time to make a statement to the House with reference to the assay office at Deadwood. I can see no objection to his doing so. What his proposition may be, I do not know.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. STEELE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that the President had approved and signed bill and joint resolution of the following titles:

H. R. 4752. An act making appropriations to provide for certain deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898; and

H. Res. 103. Joint resolution to pay the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives their respective salaries for the month of December, 1897, on the 17th of said month.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. KNOWLES. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that the report of the Committee on Appropriations makes provision for the assay office at Deadwood; and I was misled by the report in supposing that that provision was incorporated in the bill. When the bill was read I found it had been left out.

I desire now unanimous consent to recur to page 60 of this bill for the purpose of offering the amendment I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to recur to page 60 of the bill, and consider the amendment he sends up, which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 60, after line 6, insert, "For salaries at the assay office at Deadwood, S. Dak., $3,200; wages of workmen, $6,000; contingent expenses, $3,000; total, $12,200."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the amendment?

Mr. BINGHAM. I have no objection to the consideration of the matter, but I want to hear the gentleman's statement. I do not object, for the reason that the gentleman was under the impression that this provision was contained in the bill, and I think he should have an opportunity of stating the reasons why the amendment should now be adopted.

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman does not give his assent to the amendment?

Mr. BINGHAM. Oh, no.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to say that under the request, there being no objection, the amendment is now in order for consideration.

Mr. KNOWLES. Mr. Chairman, this Black Hills region produced about $6,000,000, or between $6,000,000 and $7,000,000, of gold bullion during the last year. A large percentage of that is produced by the small mines and individual miners. These men are placed at the mercy of the banks and bullion speculators, and do not get nearly the value of their bullion.

At the last session of Congress we secured an appropriation of $15,000 for the establishment of an assay office at Deadwood. The office has been already established and is one of the best equipped offices in the country. For some reason or other the Director of the Mint has made this statement to the committee, and I ask you gentlemen to listen to it. He says:

The result will be to throw the expense of transferring $3,000,000 of bullion on the Treasury coming from the Homestake and other large mines, which will deposit their bullion and get drafts on Chicago or local banks, and we will have to take the bullion and forward it to the mint.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the very reason for which the assay office at Deadwood was established, and the reason for which assay offices are established anywhere, is given here by the Director of the Mint as the reason why this particular office should be discontinued, namely, that large quantities of gold bullion are produced in the Black Hills and that the Government must pay transportation from that office to the mint! Where, then, would you establish an assay office? Would you establish one in the agricultural regions? Would you establish one where there is no gold bullion produced? Why, that very reason is the main one why we should have this assay office at Deadwood.

The office is already established, and we are soon to receive the benefits from it, and now I ask that the appropriation be continued for the coming year.

Mr. BINGHAM. I submit, Mr. Chairman, to the gentleman that the history of this legislation is very brief. It was antagonized in the House originally, but was placed in the bill in the Senate, and by concurrence in the committee of conference it was accepted. Fifteen thousand dollars was appropriated for the assay office at Deadwood.

There are now assay offices in New York, Charlotte, N. C., Boise City, Idaho, Helena, Mont., St. Louis, San Francisco, New Orleans, and Philadelphia.

In the examination of the Director of the Mint we sought to get at the necessity for this appropriation, and I will read the testimony given at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. Come to the assay office at Deadwood.
Mr. PRESTON. This is a new institution.
The CHAIRMAN. This is less than we gave the current year. I remember there was an appropriation, I think, of $15,000.
Mr. PRESTON. We had to buy balances and fit the office up, and buy furnaces and everything that was necessary to fit the office up.
The CHAIRMAN. You do not think the salaries are too large for the assay office at Deadwood?
Mr. PRESTON. No, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. Will it be in full operation next year?
Mr. PRESTON. By the 1st of January.
The CHAIRMAN. Is it in full operation now?
Mr. PRESTON. No, sir; but we are getting ready to commence operations on the 1st of January.
Mr. LIVINGSTON. Is there any real necessity for this?
Mr. PRESTON. The Department opposed it, but they got it in the Senate in a lump sum of $15,000.
Mr. LIVINGSTON. I remember that, and I believed at the time there was no necessity for it.
Mr. PRESTON. The result will be to throw the expense of transferring $3,000,000 of bullion on the Treasury, coming from the Homestake and other large mines which will deposit their bullion and get drafts on Chicago or local banks, and we will have to take the bullion and forward it to the mint.

Upon that examination the committee deemed the additional assay office was unnecessary, as they have already offices established all over the country entirely sufficient and more than sufficient, and that the Government was at a very large expense for maintaining them. At present the various assay offices throughout the country cost the Government something over $86,000. The revenue arising from them reaches something over $23,000, leaving a total of $63,301 loss to the Government in their operation.

At present the depositor of bullion pays only the cost of the assay. The Government has to pay the cost of transporting the bullion from the assay office to the coinage mint.

The Director of the Mint says the Deadwood office will relieve a large mining company of the expense of the transportation of their bullion and make the Government pay for it. In other words, the assay offices do not pay. They cost the Government $63,000 beyond the income from them. The Government does not need this assay office. The only benefit would be that it would relieve this mining company of this expense of transportation and transfer it to the Government. That is all there is in it.

Mr. KNOWLES. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BINGHAM. I open up the question in perfect fairness, in order that the gentleman may make his statement.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Will the gentleman from South Dakota pardon me for a moment, while I ask a question?

Mr. KNOWLES. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Does this bill include any provision for assays at the ports of entry where lead ores are coming in?

Mr. BINGHAM. No; it does not.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I should like to suggest, if the gentleman will pardon me for a second, that I received notice the other day that the assay office at Nogales, Ariz., where the great lead importations are received, has been done away with. The Treasury Department gave me the information that that office had been done away with on the ground of economy.

In a letter of inquiry which I have sent to the Department I have asked how they were going to get the duty on lead ores at the port of entry at Nogales, Ariz., on ores imported into the United States without an assayer present at that office. I do not see how that commerce can be stopped until they can have an assay made here in Washington of every carload of lead ore coming into the United States at Nogales, Ariz., which is the extreme southwestern part of the country.

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman will understand that the complaint he makes should not be made against this bill.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I am making no objection to this bill on that ground, but I am merely suggesting that probably the item will be reinstated in a few days in another place. [Laughter.]

Mr. BINGHAM. If the gentleman desires any information on that subject, I will read him the testimony of Mr. Preston, the Director of the Mint.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I should like to hear it.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this amendment is exhausted.

Mr. KNOWLES. I should like to say just a word.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I move to strike out the last two words, for the purpose of hearing the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM].

Mr. BINGHAM. I read Mr. Preston's statement, as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. The appropriation for 1896 for your office was $29,360, and you now ask for an increase of $1,540.
Mr. PRESTON. Yes, sir. That is due to the fact that the importations of base bullion and lead ores, formerly assayed at the ports of entry, are now assayed here, and the assayer's work has greatly increased.
The CHAIRMAN. How long has the assayer's salary been at the rate of $2,200?
Mr. PRESTON. Since 1880 it was authorized at $2,200.
The CHAIRMAN. You think it ought to be increased to $2,500?
Mr. PRESTON. I do.
The CHAIRMAN. You think the Government would suffer if we did not?
Mr. PRESTON. I would not like to say that, because I think the man is honest. We effect a saving of $7,000 or $8,000 a year in having these assays made here, and at the same time it is very valuable for statistical purposes—that is, to ascertain accurately the amount of gold and silver that comes in these lead ores and base bullion, for prior to this we had to take the word of the custom-house returns.
As there was an export duty on gold and silver ore that came from Mexico, and they levied the export duty, these people always undervalued the gold and silver contained in the lead ores, and about two years ago I discovered one firm in the United States who refined over 3,000,000 ounces more of silver from Mexican ores than the custom-house returns showed to be imported; so you see it is very valuable.

That is the testimony of Mr. Preston as to what has been heretofore and is to-day the policy with reference to the assay of lead ores.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The question which suggests itself to me in response to that is simply that this is an inference that the assayers at these ports were dishonest or incompetent.

Mr. BINGHAM. Not only that, but the fact that it is now done here.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That means that they must leave a carload of lead ore standing on the track, part in Arizona and part in Mexico, until Washington City makes the assay.

Mr. BINGHAM. Of course I can not go into that detail.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That is what they are doing in the Treasury Department; and how are they going to make an assay in the only proper way—that is, by going to the car and getting samples?

Mr. BINGHAM. The only information I can give you is as to the mode of procedure, and they do proceed under it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Then in order to collect the customs dues they simply stop commerce.

Mr. CANNON. It goes right into bond and is unloaded.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. You are forcing that on men who are not able to give the bond, men who are working by the day.

Mr. KNOWLES. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that I do not represent the Homestake Company or any other large mining corporation. I represent the labor of the Black Hills. I represent the miners who are digging the gold from the ground there, and they are the men who are being defrauded out of the just value of their bullion. They are the men I speak for, and they represent nearly one-half of the entire output of the Black Hills, aside and entirely independent from these great corporations. They are the men who are the victims of bullion sharks. There are agents of the Rothschilds in the Black Hills who are gobbling up that bullion for the purpose of cornering it and keeping it from going to the mint. Now, does not the Government of the United States pay the transportation upon all the bullion from every other assay office?

Why do you want to discriminate against us and give as a reason why our office should be discontinued that the Government will have to pay transportation charges upon bullion?

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman state, for information, the relative amount of bullion output produced by this corporation as compared with the individual output?

Mr. KNOWLES. The output of the entire section during last year was between six and seven million dollars, and of that the Homestake Company, which is the only large corporation, produced less than $3,000,000, or about $3,000,000.

Mr. DOCKERY. About one-half.

A MEMBER. Less than one-half.

Mr. KNOWLES. And what if the Homestake Company does send its bullion to the assay office? That is the benefit of having an assay office; and is not that what the assay offices are for? They are established so that the Government may get the money metal to coin and get it into circulation. That is what an assay office is for, and yet the Director of the Mint gives that as the only reason why this office should be discontinued.

Mr. BINGHAM. The only criticism I have to make as to the gentleman's argument is that this would allow the establishment of an assay office contiguous to or close to every or any great mine of the country, the real benefit going to the mine owner from the Treasury of the Government. There are assay offices contiguous to or within a reasonable distance of the location.

They are available at St. Louis, they are available at Denver, available at San Francisco. The Department submitted and gave the history as to how this office was established, stating that it is not necessary, and stating that the office was open subject to the old lines and old conditions. If the gentleman's amendment should prevail, however, I would submit that the item should be in proper form, so that it could be substituted for the one that the gentleman has offered, in order that the House may vote in a proper way upon this subject. The form as submitted in the bill originally covers the very item. That is in a better form.

Mr. KNOWLES. I took the form out of the report.

Mr. BINGHAM. We give it to you in a better form.

Mr. KELLEY. I should like to submit an inquiry to the gentleman on my left, or the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Is it not true that a large amount of the gold now mined in the Black Hills does not find its way to the American mints, but finds its way across the water to London? I will ask the gentleman from South Dakota that question, if it is not apparent to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KNOWLES. Less than one-half of the product of our mines last year went to the American mints.

Mr. DOCKERY. Less than one-half?

Mr. KNOWLES. Less than one-half.

Mr. DOCKERY. Then, as there was $6,000,000, that would be, according to the old system of calculation, about $3,000,000 that went to this office, or one-half of the output.

Mr. KNOWLES. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOCKERY. I was not present at the hearing before the subcommittee, but I am familiar with the history of this item. I know where it had its origin. I know the source from whence it came, and, in my judgment, originally, without any criticism upon the distinguished gentleman who now presents the proposition—originally it found a place in an appropriation bill, not upon any basis properly relating to the interests of the public service.

Mr. CANNON. I want to see if I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania touching this matter. It is agreed upon all hands that there are about $6,000,000 worth of gold produced from the mines near Deadwood, and half of this amount, substantially, produced by the Homestake mine. How much of that goes through the office that is produced by individuals, I do not know. Now, then, if I understand aright, the effect of the Government assay office at Deadwood is that the producer of the bullion can take his bullion and have it assayed at Deadwood, 2,000 miles and over, or about that, from the Atlantic coast and can there deposit it or sell it—if I may be allowed that word—to the United States at its value there at Deadwood, 2,000 miles from the Philadelphia mint or New York, the principal port of entry, and that he gets just as much for it 2,000 miles away as he would if he laid it down at New York or at the mint at Philadelphia.

Mr. MAHANY. Why should he not?

Mr. CANNON. Let me ask, and see if I understand it. Now, then, if this assay office is not utilized at Deadwood, then the producer of bullion, if he wants to put his product on the market and realize upon it like the producer of a steer, or a horse, or a pig, or wheat, or corn, must transport his product to Philadelphia or New York and pay the transportation himself before he can realize the New York and Philadelphia price. This is a proposition to throw the burden of the transportation of this bullion to New York upon the Government.

Mr. BINGHAM. Instead of the producer.

Mr. CANNON. Instead of the producer.

Mr. MAHANY. Oh, no.

Mr. CANNON. I am asking the gentleman from Pennsylvania if that is not the fact?

Mr. BINGHAM. That is an exact and correct statement, to the very letter.

Mr. CANNON. To the very letter. Now, if that is so, I am not willing to tax the producers of corn and wheat and cattle and the day laborers of the United States to pay transportation charges for the producer of bullion in the Homestake mine and give him the Philadelphia or the New York price without subjecting him to the cost of transportation.

Mr. MAHANY. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. MAHANY. The gentleman loses sight of the fact that this bullion, when minted, is used in the currency circulation of the United States for the benefit of the whole people.

Mr. CANNON. And I do not lose sight of the fact that the cattle and the corn and the hogs are consumed for the benefit of the whole people. [Laughter.]

Mr. MAHANY. For the benefit of certain sections, if the gentleman desires to be accurate. [Laughter.]

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I think it is hardly necessary to add a word to that which has been so well said by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. He has stated the whole case and stated it in a way that I think enables every member of the House to understand it. I only desire to add that this assay office was authorized originally against the opposition of the Treasury Department. Just how it came to find a place in the bill I am not permitted by the rules to state, but the Department protested against the establishment of it, and I hope the House will reject the amendment of the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. KNOWLES. In reply to the statement of the gentleman from Illinois, I want to ask him if that is not the law regarding every assay office?

Mr. CANNON. Then let us amend the law, and let us not extend the operation of a vicious law when we can refuse to extend it by withholding the appropriation.

Mr. MAHANY. But let us not discriminate.

Mr. KNOWLES. I want to say further that the Homestake Company is abundantly able to take care of its bullion; but it is for the poor miners of the Black Hills, who wash out or dig out a little gold for themselves during the week and then come to the banks and the bullion sharks and are robbed of 25 per cent of the value of their bullion—it is for them that I speak, and not for the Homestake Company.

Mr. CANNON. But why should the poor man in Illinois be taxed to pay the freight upon the bullion of the poor man at Deadwood, especially when in trying to protect these poor miners you do protect the Homestake men?

Mr. KNOWLES. Mr. Chairman, we have laws upon the statute books to-day for the establishment of assay offices for the very purpose of gathering in the gold bullion that is produced in this country and sending it to the mints. As an inducement to that end, the Government has agreed to take the gold at the assay offices and pay the mint value of it in order to prevent it from being sent out of the country.

That is the theory upon which all assay offices are established. Now, why do you want to discriminate against this one poor little assay office at Deadwood? Why not urge your objection against the one at St. Louis, which is in a region that does not produce any gold whatever? We produce $6,000,000 in gold, and one-half of it is produced by poor men who are not in a position to send their bullion to the mint at Philadelphia or New York, but must sell it for whatever they can get.

The report of the Director of the Mint shows that the St. Louis office only receives about $200,000 in bullion per year, and that consists mostly of old, worn-out jewelry. Why should that office be maintained and this office at Deadwood discontinued, where $6,000,000 in gold bullion will be turned over to the Government to be minted and enter our circulation?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], in the discussion of this question, has drawn a parallel between those who produce gold and those who produce farm products. He says that as in the one instance the farmer has to pay the freight on his product, so in this instance the producer of bullion ought to pay his own freight. Mr. Chairman, there has always been a distinction drawn by every civilized government in favor of the precious metals. Why? Because the increased production of the metal out of which we coin basic money has such a great influence upon the value of everything else. Gold is a measure of value, and the governments of the world have recognized that a large production of it will have a tendency to produce good times. It is upon that theory that we have free coinage of gold.

Mr. GREENE. Does the gentleman mean to say that gold is the measure of value, or that money is the measure of value? [Laughter.]

Mr. SHAFROTH. I mean to say that whatever by law is the standard becomes the measure of value. I do not agree with the theory that the only proper measure is gold. Gold is not an accurate measure, but it is the existing measure.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The gentleman speaks of the potency of gold in the commercial world. Now, wheat and cotton and one or two other products make up seven-tenths of the exports of this country. Why not, then, give the wheat producer and the cotton producer the home market instead of forcing them to have their prices fixed at Liverpool? Why not transport their products for them free to Liverpool?

Mr. SHAFROTH. In the first place, it would be utterly impracticable to do it. In the next place, the production of but a small quantity of gold exercises an enormous influence upon the price of everything else in the world, while that consideration does not apply to any of the farm products.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The United States could not live without its agricultural products.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is true; but the price of one does not influence the price of the other. There is no question that if you increase the amount of gold in the world you thereby increase the price of everything else in the world. Hence the tendency of all governments has been to give free coinage. Why? Because it tends to beneficially affect business conditions, to increase the prices of commodities, to produce prosperity; and for the same reason it is to the interest of our Government to have these assay offices in various portions of the United States, so as to give gold there the value which it has at the mint at Philadelphia and thereby encourage the production of the metal which measures everything else in the world.

Now, it seems to me the reasoning presented here as to farm products is not applicable, because wheat is not made by law a standard of value; nor is corn or any other agricultural product. But we all know that under our laws gold is the standard, and any increased production of gold affects enormously the price of commodities. There is no doubt about that. Hence there has been a disposition continually upon the part of governments to increase the gold product. When silver was a basic money metal, and when free coinage of silver existed, there was equal encouragement to that metal.

The increase of basic money will always have a tendency to make prosperous times. Governments all over the world have recognized this fact and have encouraged in every possible manner the increase of the production of the metal of whatever may be the standard money. It has been recognized that encouragement of this kind not only affects the metal which is the measure of value, but affects everything that the metal measures. Hence it helps the farmer by increasing the price of his commodities.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, the proposition presented here is, I think, a very simple one. The general location of Deadwood is known to the House. Contiguous or adjacent to it we have assay offices at Denver, Boise City, Helena, and St. Louis. The real question is, Do we need another assay office? We have the statement of the Department that this office is not needed; that the existing assaying offices are carried on at a large loss, so that the establishment of a new assay office would entail increased expense to the Government. That is the whole proposition before the House.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. Chairman, although I have not heard all of this debate, I understand the objection to be urged to this proposition that there are to-day a sufficient number of assay offices belonging to the Government of the United States, and that such an office at Deadwood, S. Dak., is not required. Now, I wish to say something with reference to the growth of this business of mintage and assaying in the United States. In the early history of our country the mint was established at Philadelphia. Why? Because at that time Philadelphia was very near the center of population—a population not then engaged in any way in the production of the precious metals. All that was necessary then was a mint that would turn into coin the bullion or coin coming in from other countries.

Since that time there has been a great revolution in the production of the precious metals in this country. Rich gold and silver deposits have been discovered in the great West—in the Rocky Mountains, in the Sierra Nevada Mountains. Yet, ignoring the fact that the production of silver is in the West, we have been constantly increasing the mintage and assaying facilities of the East. Instead of putting the mints where the mines are, we have been transporting our bullion to the Philadelphia mint and minting there the products of mines 3,000 miles away. We have been constantly enlarging the Philadelphia mint, at great expense. Now, what would the gentleman from Philadelphia think of me if I should suggest that an armor-plate plant to be constructed by the Government should be placed upon the heights of the Rocky Mountains? What would he think if it should be suggested that a navy-yard should be established upon Lake Tahoe? Yet here we have the proposition gravely urged Congress after Congress that, though the mineral production of the great West amounts to nearly a hundred million dollars annually, that product shall be transported a distance of 3,000 miles to be coined and minted in the East. We have helped you gentlemen of the East to open your mills, and now you propose to close our mints; and you propose to close them at just those points of production where these two occupations, mining and minting, ought to be linked together. Where do you have your assay offices? In New York, in St. Louis, in Philadelphia, and even in Charlotte, N. C., to which no objection is made by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BINGHAM. All mints have an assay office.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes; but there is no mint at St. Louis, although you have an assay office there. For all practical purposes St. Louis is about as remote from the mining regions as is Philadelphia. We regard St. Louis as a portion of the great East, not of the great West.

But how is it with Charlotte, N. C.? Will the gentleman claim that there is necessity for a mint there? If there is any large production of either silver or gold there, that is another question. The Appropriations Committee give a considerable sum for the Charlotte (N. C.) assay office. Now, I have no objection in the world to their having such an office there. If, I repeat, there is any production whatever of gold or silver in North Carolina, that production should be stimulated by the Government of the United States, and if the creation of an assay office in the mineral regions will stimulate that industry, I claim that there should be no hesitation in making appropriation for it.

But, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the system of appropriating to the East all of the industries that belong to the West, industries that can be properly and economically conducted near the source of production.

I shall have a few more words to say on this subject when the question of the Carson mint shall be reached; but now I rise only for the purpose of saying that I hope the request of the gentleman from South Dakota will be granted, and that that State will be recognized as the fifth mineral-producing State of the country by inserting in the law the amendment he presents.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I am not familiar with the assay office in Deadwood, and shall not undertake to speak advisedly as to the particular need of an office there. But upon the general idea of encouraging the mineral industries of the country I certainly favor this appropriation.

It is very true that some of the assay offices are not self-supporting. Yet I am quite sure it is an advantage, and a large advantage to the locality.

Now, we have in our Western country mines other than gold and silver. We have lead and zinc mines and ores of various other kinds that have to be assayed, and are assayed.

I agree to the proposition that wherever there is a large mining interest of gold or silver or other minerals to be assayed that the prospectors and miners are not the only ones interested in maintaining these assay offices, but it is in the interest of the Government and of the people of the country generally to maintain such institutions. A miner who has a claim may be a poor man. He has his claim, or an interest in it, and yet he would prefer, sir, to have that prospect assayed by the Government of the United States, because he can rely upon that with more certainty than upon an assay made by a private individual.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a question?

Mr. BLAND. Certainly.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman is more familiar with this subject than I am; but is it not a fact that in all of the large mines they have an individual assayer out there, and is it not true that these assays are made and business transacted wholly upon his report?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. But he is employed, as a rule, by the corporation or mine owner.

Mr. BLAND. That is precisely what I am undertaking to elucidate. These private assayers are not satisfactory to the poor miner. These large corporations or wealthy mine owners are able to employ their own assayers, and frequently at the expense and cost of the poor miners, who have not facilities and are not able to employ their own assayers. They are not willing to trust the assays made by these private corporations or rich individuals, but desire that the Government shall assay and place the value upon their product; and in that respect an assay office is valuable and convenient in every mining district.

As to the expense, it might be said that we maintain throughout the country a great many institutions connected with the industries of the people that do not pay expenses and are not remunerative so far as the question of maintaining them goes. I might instance the expenditures for the agricultural people in the maintenance of experimental stations, and so on. If we maintain these institutions for their benefit, why should we not maintain assay offices for the benefit of the miners of the country of the far West, where it can be shown that the industry is of sufficient importance to warrant the expenditure, and not drive men to private institutions, which would or might in many instances take advantage of them.

I say I know nothing whatever of this office in Dakota. I am not sufficiently informed as to the mining industry in that region, but with the statement made in regard to it by gentlemen who are familiar with the subject I can sustain the proposition made by the gentleman to give them an assay office there whether it pays expenses or not; and, so far as this industry is concerned, I am satisfied that the expenditure for the assay office would pay ten times what it costs in the encouragement of the industry and in building up that region of our country.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having taken the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its secretaries, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed of the report of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, in addition to the usual number, 500 copies of the report proper, 500 copies of the report of the assistant inspector-general on the State Homes, and 150 copies of the record of members for the use of the Home.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. 2793. An act for the purchase or construction of a vessel for the Revenue-Cutter Service on the Yukon River, Alaska; and

S. 2764. An act for the relief of the heirs of Pom K. Soh, deceased.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendment the bill (H. R. 5173) authorizing the Secretary of War, in his discretion, to purchase subsistence stores, supplies, and materials for the relief of people who are in the Yukon River country, to provide means for the transportation, distribution, and making an appropriation therefor, had requested a conference with the House of Representatives on the said bill and amendment, and had appointed Mr. HAWLEY, Mr. CARTER, and Mr. COCKRELL as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

RELIEF OF MINERS IN ALASKA.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the House nonconcur in the amendments of the Senate to the bill making an appropriation for the Alaska sufferers.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection to the present consideration of the measure which we have just received from the Senate, it will be laid before the House.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 5173) authorizing the Secretary of War in his discretion to purchase subsistence stores, supplies, and materials for the relief of the people who are in the Yukon River country, to provide means for their transportation and distribution, and making an appropriation therefor, with a Senate amendment thereto.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment.

Mr. CANNON. I move that the House nonconcur in the Senate amendment and assent to the request for a committee of conference.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. CANNON, Mr. NORTHWAY, and Mr. SAYERS.

REGENTS OF THE SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, announced the appointment of Mr. WHEELER of Alabama, Mr. HITT, and Mr. ADAMS as Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, the appointment to date as of December 22.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session and continued the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, with Mr. HOPKINS in the chair.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. I move to strike out the last six words. I will occupy the time of the House only a moment. I merely want to read what the Director of the Mint says before the committee relative to the assay office at St. Louis:

The CHAIRMAN. You stand on your recommendation for the assay office at St. Louis, Mo., at $3,000?
Mr. PRESTON. Oh, yes.
Mr. LIVINGSTON. What use have you for it?
Mr. PRESTON. We get a little gold there, $100,000 or $200,000 a year; principally old jewelry and such stuff is deposited.
The CHAIRMAN. Have you anything else to state to us?
Mr. PRESTON. No, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. Will your report be out next week?
Mr. PRESTON. Yes, sir; I think so.

Now, we appropriate $3,000 to carry on an assay office in St. Louis, where there is no mint, where the Director of the Mint states there is nothing deposited except some old jewelry, and we are confronted with this condition, that the committee refuses to make an appropriation to carry on the assay office in South Dakota, where they produce at least $6,000,000 of gold every year. It seems to me that this is discrimination against the West. I think the difficulty is that a great many men who live so far east have no idea that there is any country lying west of the Missouri River. They ought to take a trip out there some time and see what a country this is and learn something about the resources of their own country. Then they would have more enlarged ideas as to the necessities of the great West.

Mr. MAHANY. If the gentleman from Kansas will allow me, our friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] drew a fallacious parallel between the agriculturist and the miner. The farmer markets his products under fixed and known conditions. He can get quotations every day from the newspapers of his vicinity and there is little or no opportunity for deceiving him in the price of his products, whereas the isolated miner is the victim of corporate greed and the sharks of private concerns.

Now, another point in this matter. The nearest assay office to Deadwood is Denver, 1,000 miles away, and Denver is, if anything, farther from the mint than is Deadwood.

Mr. GAINES. Will you answer a question?

Mr. MAHANY. If I can.

Mr. GAINES. Where is the product from the mines of that State assayed?

Mr. MAHANY. I believe it is assayed principally at the offices of these private corporations, many of them under the control of European capital.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I want to say in conclusion, in connection with the agricultural interests in the West, that the farms of the great West find a market, to a large extent, in the mining regions; that all those mining States furnish a market for our products, and anything that adds to the prosperity of the mining regions adds to the prosperity of the farmers in the great West, and therefore every member, particularly from that section, whether a farmer or a miner, or interested in farming or mining, should vote for this proposition to give them an assay office at Deadwood.

Mr. BINGHAM. In response to the gentleman from Kansas, he having made reference to the assay office at St. Louis as well as at Deadwood, I want to answer this: The St. Louis assay office was established by an act of Congress, after discussion and debate, about 1880. It is a completed assay office, fully equipped. The appropriation carried in the bill for that assay office is $4,780. That, understand, came in as an act of Congress.

The Deadwood office was never deliberated upon by Congress, but came in as a rider on an appropriation bill. They ask for that office in this bill—having had $15,000 in the current year—$12,200; and the Director of the Mint says it is not in full operation and could not be put into full operation until next year.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. Let me suggest, in answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that in St. Louis, with not more than $200,000, and that probably in jewelry, they seem to have an influence or pull upon Congress sufficient to establish an assay office there, while out in Dakota, where they produce $6,000,000 of this ore in a year, they have not influence enough in Congress to pass an act to get an appropriation, but instead of that have to get it through surreptitiously as a rider on an appropriation bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman knows that at reasonably contiguous points there are assay offices.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. That shows how little the interests of the miners in the West are cared for.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a pro forma amendment.

I am quite content that the committee should take such action as their good judgment shall dictate; but I want the facts to be fully understood, and no word or statement of my side, and no word or statement of the other side, if there be two sides touching the fact or the want of it, can change the fact.

I think I understand the situation touching the Government assay offices at various places in the country. I think the gentlemen who have been talking, most of them, know. I am quite sure the gentleman from Nevada does, and I am quite sure the gentleman from South Dakota does. They represent that part of the country, and have an opportunity to know of it.

Mr. MAHANY. Oh, some others of us have rays of intelligence on the subject. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. I was just about to mention my genial friend from Buffalo, but he would not give me time. [Laughter.] Now, what are the facts? At every mining camp in this country there are plenty of assay offices, and the assaying can be done at a small charge, and is done. There are private assay offices, just as there are private mechanics of any kind—private machine shops, private stores, and private assay offices—in which are perfectly competent men, and they do it without any considerable charge.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question? In your first statement you argued against the interests of the Homestake Mining Company. Now, is not the gentleman aware that the individual miners are poor men in the Black Hills, and that they are at the mercy of the Homestake Mining Company in having their ores assayed?

Mr. CANNON. Does not the gentleman know that there is more than one corporation that receives the ores?

Mr. KELLEY. There is but one great one there, and that is the Homestake Company.

Mr. CANNON. Does not the gentleman know that there is more than one private assay office carrying on business at this mining camp outside of the Homestake Company, to which anyone who has bullion to assay can take his bullion and at a small charge get it assayed? Nobody will controvert that statement of facts. Now, having said that much, what have we? The great corporations of this country—and I am not abusing them—they have a right to exist under your laws and mine. You and I are both glad that they do exist.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him another question?

Mr. CANNON. Not until I answer this one, but I will yield to the gentleman before I sit down. They have a right to exist, and the citizen has a right to exist. All of them can get their bullion assayed at a small charge by people who are in that business in Deadwood and at every other mining camp. Now, in the name of practically the poor miner, that he may get his ore assayed, you say, let the Government assay it. That is not all you are after. What you want to do is—if you can get a Government assay office at Deadwood and at the other mining camps—to take that bullion to that assay office, and after it is assayed, then, under the law, you want to say to your Government and mine, "Give me the New York price for that bullion;" and the Government, under the law, is bound to do it.

Mr. KNOWLES. Do they not do it?

Mr. CANNON. Let me finish that statement. With that assay office there, what is the result? The $3,000,000 of bullion produced by the Homestake Mining Company, the largest amount of bullion produced by any corporation, and a smaller amount of bullion produced by the individuals is then and there delivered to the Government, and the Government has to deliver it over to the express company to transport it to the mint at Philadelphia, or to New York, paying the transportation, and this and other bills carry from $40,000 to $60,000 a year to pay for that transportation. Now, there is the whole question. "But," says my very intelligent and learned friend from Nevada, for whom I have very great respect, "presently we shall come to the mint at Carson, and I shall have something to say about that."

Mr. NEWLANDS. Do not anticipate.

Mr. CANNON. If I recollect aright, the mint at Carson is omitted from this appropriation. Why? Because when the population of Nevada was larger and she got her two Senators, away back in boom times, under the cry of benefiting the poor man, without being sufficiently advised, we not only established an assay office, but a mint at Carson. That has been a great industry for Carson. I say it with respect, but if you will go back to the appropriation bills, you will find that the officers of that mint, without doing a great deal of mintage, have run a very profitable industry at that point. Now, in fact, we have no more use for an assay office at Deadwood or an assay office in Nevada or an assay office in these mining camps than we have for any other thing that we do not need.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. CANNON. In a moment. You can find the milk in the cocoanut whenever you refuse action which will load these freight charges upon the Government, which is the thing at stake, amounting to from $40,000 to $60,000 a year. When we propose to do equal and exact justice by all people, here is Deadwood, here is my friend from Carson, here is my friend from Denver, here is my friend from Boise City and the other mining camps—here they all are, saying, "We must flock together or the effete and corrupt East will prevent us from putting upon the Government the cost of the freight on our products when they go to market, but leave us to pay it ourselves as every other producer has to do."

I do not want to obscure this matter. I want members to understand all about it; and that great apostle of free silver from the State of Missouri [Mr. BLAND] may rise in his place and agonize, and the eminent statesman from the great State of Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON] may agonize for the poor man, but I say to him: Sir, while the farmers in your district are compelled to pay the freight upon their products when they send them to market, you propose, by this kind of legislation, to still further tax them to pay the freight upon the bullion that is produced in the mining camps when it is sent to market.

Mr. MAHANY. But the farmers are not robbed in the original price.

Mr. CANNON. Nobody is robbed in the original price.

Mr. MAHANY. The poor miners are.

Mr. CANNON. Not at all. I state again that at every mining camp there are one or more reliable private assayers, who for a small charge will assay this bullion.

Mr. NEWLANDS. May I interrupt my friend's athletic exercise for just one observation? [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Certainly; and I hope that I shall have developed strength enough to keep you from lifting any more money out of the Treasury for a useless mint at Carson. [Laughter.]

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last seven words.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I understand that that motion is made for my benefit. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question.

Mr. CANNON. I will answer it if I can.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Assuming, as is the fact, that there is a United States mint at Philadelphia and one at Carson, and assuming that $600,000,000 in gold and silver, in almost equal proportions, were produced in the State of Pennsylvania near the Philadelphia mint, what would the gentleman think of the policy of a government which would send that $600,000,000 of bullion 3,000 miles across the continent to be coined into money? Yet that would be practically equivalent to what is done. Six hundred million dollars of Nevada's gold and silver have gone to the Philadelphia mint.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman knows that it is the only fully equipped mint in the country.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Well, I do not accuse the gentleman from Pennsylvania of anything like greed, but I do say that all psychologists admit that on these occasions there is a certain unconscious cerebration which affects the minds of Pennsylvania and Massachusetts statesmen in regard to every industry of those communities. [Laughter.] Why should we have these $600,000,000 of gold and silver bullion produced in Nevada dragged to Philadelphia to be coined into money?

Mr. BINGHAM. And circulated there.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Nevada has asked me a question. Does he desire that I shall answer it?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY. I have the floor, I believe.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] had the floor and yielded to the gentleman from Nevada to ask a question. The gentleman from North Dakota can have time. There is no trouble about that.

Mr. KELLEY. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois to answer the question of the gentleman from Nevada.

Mr. CANNON. I believe I have the floor. I will only state in conclusion, and in answer to the question of the gentleman from Nevada, that if the gold which is produced in Nevada or which is produced at Deadwood were kept there it would not avail the producers anything. If it were kept there, it would be of no more use to him than while it was resting in the eternal hills—if they are eternal. Now, having gone to work and mined the product, having put his labor into it, he wants to realize upon it, and he has to send it where there is a demand for it. Where is the demand for it? At the great centers of population. Where are the great centers of population? One thousand and two thousand miles away from him.

Now, then, in his greed he says, "I have a smart Member of Congress or a smart Senator," or the smart Representative or Senator says, "I will do something for the miner without waiting for him to request it." So the effort is made by some hocus-pocus to bring about a condition of things under which the producer of the metal may get for it at the point of production the New York price. So he unloads it upon the Government, and the Government at a dead loss of from fifty to sixty thousand dollars a year transports it to where there is a demand for it. I say that is not fair.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, I come from a section of country not interested in mining. I represent an agricultural section of country. I have no personal interest whatever in this amendment. I represent a class of people who would have to pay the freight, as the gentleman from Illinois puts it, upon the transportation of this gold from the assay office to the mints of the United States. But it seems to me that the gentleman from Illinois does not wish to understand the real substance of this question. The policy of the Government of the United States is and has been to encourage the mining of—I was going to say both gold and silver—I will put it gold, at least, and we take it for granted that it is now the policy of the Republican party, inasmuch as that party adheres to the single gold standard, to encourage by all possible means the production of gold in the United States.

It is well known, gentlemen of the committee, that the Government establishes agricultural colleges and similar institutions that the best results may be obtained in such industries. And I say that the establishment of an assay office at Deadwood, S. Dak., is for the purpose of encouraging the mining of gold there. If it does this, it is for the advantage of the people engaged in the mining of gold, and it inures to the benefit of the farmers in South Dakota and Nebraska and Missouri, and it not only inures to their benefit, but to the benefit of the manufacturers of the East as well.

What were the arguments made a few days since on this floor by nearly all members when we were making an appropriation to relieve the suffering of the Klondike people, the gold diggers of the Klondike region?

Why, gentlemen, you stated that those men had gone there for the purpose of mining gold, and that gold was needed in your business. And when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] undertakes to draw comparisons between gold and agricultural products he fails to be consistent, or he fails to show that keenness of the perceptive faculties which he usually displays. The gentleman says the farmer might as well demand free transportation for his stock as for the miner to ask free transportation of the precious metals. I would remind you, gentlemen, that you have free coinage of gold in the United States, because gold is the material out of which you make money, but you have not free coinage of beef, or pork, or wheat. If these products were recognized by law as materials out of which money could be made, then the reasoning of the gentleman from Illinois would apply to them. them. But inasmuch as they are not, and inasmuch as money and the materials out of which it is made affect directly the well-being of the American people and of all civilized people (for we can not have civilization without money), special legislation, giving encouragement to the production of gold, ought to receive the favorable consideration of this body.

I do not believe that the objections brought against this amendment by the gentleman from Illinois are well taken. If the gentleman wishes to be consistent, he will demand the abolition of each and every one of the assay offices in the United States. The same argument that he brings against the establishment of this assay office at Deadwood will apply to every assay office in the country, and I challenge the gentleman to contradict that statement.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, to my friend from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] I have only this to say: The Philadelphia mint was the first mint established by the Government; it is the great coinage mint to-day. Congress, after full debate, determined by special act in 1890 or 1891 that a new mint building should be constructed at Philadelphia. That building is now in progress.

Over a million dollars has already been appropriated for its construction and now stands to the credit of the new building. I trust it will be completed. I trust it will continue to do the great work that has been done at Philadelphia since the first mint building was constructed there.

Last year the mint at Philadelphia, under the law, after the expenditure and payment of heavy obligations, turned over into the Treasury of the Government $1,600,000.

I desire to have made a part of my remarks, as bearing upon this question a telegram from Mr. Preston, the Director of the Mint, which was received this morning in response to some inquiries addressed to him with reference to this assay office, which has been brought out in the debate, and simply desire to have it put in concrete form in the RECORD.

The telegram is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, December 16, 1897.

Hon. H. H. BINGHAM:

My objections for the establishment of assay offices either at Deadwood or other points are that they are expensive and from which the Government derives little revenue. Under the law the charges to be imposed upon deposits of either gold or silver are limited to the actual expenses of fitting the bullion for coinage or making fine bars of the same, and the further fact that all deposits of gold made at the Western institutions such as Denver, Boise, Helena, and St. Louis, and which will be the case at Deadwood. The bullion is paid for and the expenses of transportation to the coinage mints is thrown upon the Government. Very large amounts of gold bullion are now being deposited at Denver. Fully $15,000,000 will be deposited at that institution during the current fiscal year, and the cost to the Government of transporting the same to Philadelphia will be about $30,000. It is expected that the Deadwood office will be opened for business about the 1st proximo, or shortly after.

The principal depositor will no doubt be a very large and wealthy mining company. The company will receive full value less the charges incident to fitting the bullion for coinage, and the expenses of transportation to a coinage mint will be paid by the Government. Of course you will understand that the charges for parting and refining and fitting the bullion for coinage are collected from the depositor, but the expenses of transportingare not, and I can see no reason whatever why the Government should not collect from the depositor of gold bullion a sum sufficient to cover the cost of this transportation to the coinage mints.

The cost of maintaining the minor assay offices of the United States for the fiscal year 1897 was $84,604, while the earnings were only $23,303.

R. E. PRESTON, Director of the Mint.

But there is one proposition that comes before us at this time, and then I hope we will have a vote on the bill. Have we enough assay offices? That is the question. The last one established was in St. Louis, in 1879 or 1880, I think. That is my recollection. Now comes up this contention for the assay office, made in the law, as I have before stated, which is to-day not ready for full operation. That is all there is of it.

Mr. KELLEY. I would say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that you have undoubtedly enough assay offices, but you have them established where they ought not to be. That is the difficulty. Why not place them where the people who need them can be accommodated by them, and where men engaged in digging out the minerals from the earth may have an opportunity of availing themselves of the convenience and safety thereof?

Mr. BINGHAM. I have no other statement than that we have given four contiguous assay offices.

A MEMBER. What do you consider as contiguous?

Mr. BINGHAM. Within a thousand miles, as distances go in the West.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will my colleague have the telegrams read before the vote is taken?

Mr. BINGHAM. They have been already elucidated in the debate.

Mr. GAINES. What is the objection of the Director of the Mint to the establishment of this assay office?

Mr. BINGHAM. Because it is unnecessary, and because there are four assay offices near, as they call it in the West, to that point.

Also, that it involves a heavy and immediate expenditure to the Government; that it runs for the benefit of the large miners, and that the Government will have to transport from the assay office to the point of coinage at the Government's expense, when it could be carried and should be carried by the great mining operators themselves.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If the gentleman will allow me to submit a question?

Mr. BINGHAM. With pleasure.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. There was some force in the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] as to the freight question. If the Government buys gold to mint for governmental purposes, who ought to pay the freight? I ask the gentleman that question.

Mr. BINGHAM. Why, the Government does pay it now. But the Government must not put up assay offices at great expense and loss for every man who owns a mine. You do not want that?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. But the proposition goes very much further than that.

Mr. BINGHAM. Oh, no.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The trouble is that these establishments are not located in the proper places. You have provided, at a vast expense, for the establishment of a mint in the city of Philadelphia, when there is not one of them in the West, and which keeps up the natural tendency that is driving the money from the mining regions to the great money centers of the East.

Now, while in the West we pay two-thirds of the money in mining to the miners themselves, if these establishments were maintained in Carson, or South Dakota, or elsewhere in the mining regions, the money would go straight from the mint into the pockets of the men who do the work—the miners and the mine owners.

But under the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois, that the Government is paying a vast amount for freight, let me ask him, how does it get its bullion at this time? If it gets it for minting purposes for the Government, the Government should pay the freight. Why should it require the miner or the mine owners to pay it? You simply rob him of millions of hard-earned money by forcing him to bring it to Philadelphia.

Mr. BINGHAM. Now, Mr. Chairman, you have a mint at Philadelphia——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. No; you have it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BINGHAM. Well, you have one in San Francisco, and both Philadelphia and San Francisco are in operation. There will be another at Denver, making three. The conditions have changed as to the New Orleans mint in many ways. There is also the mint at Carson City. But you have the two mints in full operation at San Francisco and Philadelphia and one building at Denver.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Denver is nearer the mining regions than San Francisco. Why should you not make the Denver mint the great minting place of America? If you are to have one at all, is not that the proper location for it—a central point?

Mr. BINGHAM. You can not build a mint in a day. In 1890 or 1891—I have forgotten the exact date—we passed an act providing for a mint at Philadelphia, and we have only reached the first story in construction. You want a mint there. You have always had a mint at Philadelphia. You need it there. It is the great center of the population of the East. It is the great center of your business and money disbursements.

Mr. KNOWLES. I want to make one more statement in reply to the remarks made by the gentleman from Illinois. There is not a private assay office in the Black Hills that assays the bullion. There are assay offices there that assay ore, to tell a man how much gold he has got in his ore, but there is not an assay office there for the purpose of assaying or buying bullion. What we want is a market for the bullion produced there, which we have a right to, as the miners of other regions have. We say that we have the right to deposit our bullion in the assay office and get the mint price for it, just as they do in any other assay office. Why this discrimination against this office in Deadwood? The office at Denver is nearly a thousand miles farther from the mint than ours. If the Government can afford to transport the bullion from Denver, it certainly can afford to transport it from Deadwood.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph. This question as to the mining of gold—and before a great while as to the mining of silver, because both will be the money of this country under free coinage before long—addresses itself to the people of this country in a different manner from what it has been put before this House; and especially at this time, when we must depend upon gold and gold only, according to the regulations of the Department, for the redemption of greenbacks and Treasury notes and bonds, and to be full legal-tender money. If that is the case, and we are to be put in that condition, then, sir, it becomes a necessity for the people of this country to encourage gold mining. I do not understand that the expense of transporting gold from the mining sections or from the assay office to the mint should cut any great figure in this case.

I presume under our laws that where gold bullion or silver bullion is deposited at an assay office—gold bullion especially—that the transporting to the mint would be at the expense of the Government. Now, suppose there is a mine which is barely paying the expense of the output. If you saddle the additional expense of transporting the bullion from the mine to the mint, it closes that mine and to that extent limits the amount of money that goes into circulation. For, after all, the question here is whether we ought to have a full circulation or a meager circulation.

As long as mines pay, the output will to some extent meet the demand, but if obstructions are put in the way of mining and no encouragement is given to it, the output is limited and the circulation is limited; and when you limit the circulation of money, you bring bankruptcy and distress upon the people of the country. So that the question goes deeper than the mere expense of an assay office. It goes to the fundamental question as to the amount of money that may be put in circulation. To encourage mining is to encourage an increase of circulation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this has no analogy to the transportation of farm products. This goes to the idea of the amount of money that may be produced from year to year, whether it should be great or whether it should be small, so that if these large corporations have an opportunity of exporting bullion to the mints free of charge, so may the smaller corporations, so may the man who has a mine that barely pays expenses, which without this facility could not be worked at all. The question is a greater one than that. It means, Shall we encourage the production of the precious metals of this country for monetary use, or shall we discourage it, in order to contract the money volume?

There is the great question before this committee; and if an assay office at Deadwood or any other place in Dakota has a tendency to swell the volume of money in circulation, it should be the policy of the Government to encourage it, especially so far as the great mass of the people are concerned. It may not be the policy of those who seek to discourage and shrink the circulating medium or of those who are opposed to the restoration of silver and would like to see a small output of gold. As far as I am concerned and, I believe, as far as the great party with which I cooperate is concerned, we believe it ought to be the policy of this Government to encourage every avenue of getting money into circulation to maintain prices and prosperity in this country.

Mr. BINGHAM. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. BINGHAM. Let the Clerk read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Assay office at Deadwood: For assayer in charge, who shall also perform the duties of melter, $2,000; one clerk, $1,200; in all, $3,200.

For wages of workmen, $6,000.

For incidental and contingent expenses, $3,000.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. GREENE. Division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 77, noes 76. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BINGHAM. Tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. BINGHAM, and the gentleman from South Dakota, Mr. KNOWLES.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 89, noes 86. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, when the committee had under consideration the paragraphs covering the mints and assay offices of the country the gentleman from Nevada was absent from the city and in New York. He telegraphed me, asking if I would not ask unanimous consent to pass by the paragraph in connection with mints and assay offices.

Although the paragraph formed no part of the bill before us, I replied that he would have an opportunity to offer an amendment. He replied he would have offered an amendment if he had been present. I signified to him that when we should come to the close of the bill he should have an opportunity to offer an amendment for the consideration of the committee. Am I correct?

Mr. NEWLANDS nodded assent.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. Chairman, I am very much indebted to the gentleman for his courtesy, and I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend paragraph 55 by inserting between lines 17 and 18 the following:

"Mint at Carson, Nev.: For superintendent, $3,000; assayer, and melter and refiner, at $2,500 each; chief clerk, $1,800; bookkeeper, cashier, assistant assayer, assistant melter and refiner, and weigh clerk, at $1,500 each; in all $17,300.

"For wages of workmen, $10,000; for incidental and contingent expenses, including wastage of operative officers and loss on sale of sweeps, $5,000."

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. Chairman, the customary five minutes will not permit me to present all I wish to submit on this subject, and I will ask the indulgence of the House for at least ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nevada asks permission to speak continuously ten minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. Chairman, there are, or were, five mints in the United States: One at Philadelphia, one at San Francisco, one at New Orleans, one in process of construction at Denver, and one at Carson. The mint at Carson is abolished by this act. The question has arisen in the discussion of the last amendment as to where the coinage should properly be done—whether in the East, in the great commercial and banking centers of the country, or in the West, where the bullion is produced—and my learned friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] labored under the misapprehension that these assay offices and mints were organized in the Western States with a view of enabling the miners there to get a higher price for their product, unmindful of the fact that so far as gold is concerned—and coinage is now confined to gold, except as to the accumulated stock—it is the privilege now of the miner to take his bullion to the mint and have it turned into coin; that he receives the coin, the Government making no purchase of bullion whatever. The question is whether that convenience should be afforded to him nearer the source of production or 3,000 miles away, in the Eastern States.

And here let me make the suggestion that had the mining regions of this country been opened when our Government was formed, undoubtedly the mints would have been placed nearer the mines, just as every industry is placed near the source of the product with which it deals. There is no doubt that had all the bullion of the country, the gold and the silver, produced during the past thirty years been mined in the West, our financial condition would have been much better, for in that case, with both the gold and silver, the miner would simply have received in payment gold and silver coin. Now, imagine how that would have simplified the silver question. These people in the West were used to the use of metallic money. The people of the East were unaccustomed to the use of metallic money.

Why, metallic money hardly existed for years before the war. It did not exist during the war. The people of the East had become accustomed to paper money and unaccustomed to either silver or gold, and rejected the use of both. So that we had paper in the East in broadest use, whereas on the Pacific Coast and in the mountain States the feeling was quite to the contrary. There they are used to the coin, and do not like the paper money. I find that I have to revolutionize my own habits twice every year in the way of becoming accustomed to paper and metallic money. I go West and recur to the use of the metallic money, and I find that I do not like to have twenty-dollar gold pieces and silver coins in my pocket, and after I become accustomed to them I prefer them to paper; and then after a while, on my return East, I strike paper money again and have no metallic money, and paper money is distasteful to me, for it seems to be the storehouse of contagion of every kind.

Now, this is a mere matter of habit. Had we consulted the habits of the West, we would have permitted the owners of silver bullion to present it at the mint and to receive either its coinage value or its market value, according to existing legislation, in absolute coin, receiving in the one case all and in the other only a part, the difference between the market value and the coinage value being retained by the Government as seigniorage. And what would have been the result? Probably three-fourths or more of the bills of the miners are for wages. The silver coin is paid to the miners, who pay it to the men from whom they obtain their supplies, and the merchants use it in buying flour and grain and clothes and other supplies.

Thus you would find the actual use of silver extending to the entire Western region, where they are accustomed to it, and gradually to the Southern and Middle Western States, where also they are accustomed to it and like it, and you would have a circulation of this currency in the region that now most requires it, instead of having this silver accumulating in your Treasury, where it constitutes a menace to the world. For, recollect that the average intellect does not comprehend that that silver is constructively coined and in the hands of the people in the form of silver certificates. The average intellect regards it as an accumulation of silver which, as a result of hostile legislation, may be let loose upon the world and produce a flood of this money.

So I say a wise public policy would have put your mills near your raw products, your mints near your mines, and the result would have been that both gold and silver would, from these centers of production and centers of coinage, have been spread all over the Western and the Southern and the Middle Western region, and would gradually reach the East itself, and accustom the people there to the use of the only real money, the only money of redemption.

Now we come to the question of what justice requires at this time. Philadelphia has thus far appropriated almost all the coinage of the silver and gold produced in the West. Only recently, outside of the legislation relating to the Carson mint, has favorable legislation been introduced relating to the Denver mint, a mint which is not yet completed. Increased appropriations have been made for the Philadelphia mint, while diminishing appropriations have been made for this Western mint.

Now, gentlemen, I wish to say, with reference to Nevada, that the total product of both gold and silver in the United States has been a little less than two billions and a half since 1860, and that Nevada has produced, in almost equal proportions of the two metals, one-fourth of this amount. I said to a friend the other day with reference to this legislation, that it was hardly a graceful action to take away the mint from Nevada, a State which had produced one-fourth of the country's metallic stock, and he added, parenthetically, "And three-fourths of the hell." All I have to say with reference to that is, that this remonstrance from Nevada is a natural remonstrance against legislation which has destroyed the leading industry of that State and paralyzed it.

You can understand what this would mean simply as an industrial question as applied to the iron mills or the steel plants of Pennsylvania, or to the cotton mills and woolen mills of Massachusetts. It is a natural and healthy and indignant protest against what the State of Nevada regards as bad and destructive legislation. Now, it is true that the bullion production of that State has declined. She is no longer producing silver in large quantities. There is no stimulus now for the production of silver, and the people of Nevada have turned their attention to gold. Already this year it is evident that the product of gold will probably be double that of last year. The total of both gold and silver production of that State is now pretty nearly $5,000,000, of which, I believe, three-fifths is gold.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DOCKERY. How much more time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like five minutes.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. NEWLANDS. As I say, Nevada has produced six hundred millions of gold and silver, and yet she has been permitted to coin at that Nevada mint only forty-nine millions. There is to-day stored up in the Philadelphia mint $110,000,000 of silver bullion, most of which was produced in the Nevada mines.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I should like to ask the gentleman a question for information.

Mr. NEWLANDS. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Does it not cost the people who mine this gold and silver—principally gold now—something to get it to the Philadelphia mint, and would they not have a larger net return when their money was handed back to them if the coinage were done on the spot?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should think so.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Then the practice the gentleman complains of imposes a tax upon these miners for the financial benefit of the people of Philadelphia. [Laughter.]

Mr. NEWLANDS. Now, I say that at the Carson mint we have coined only forty-nine millions and the action of the Directors of the Mint has always, in my judgment, been hostile to that mint. They have declaimed against the cost of coinage at the Carson mint.

Gentlemen can readily understand that if they should allow only one pound of bullion to be coined there in a year, the cost of coining that one pound must be the entire salary list of the mint for the year; so that the cost of coinage will depend upon the amount of bullion that is put into the mint for coinage, and if the silver which is naturally tributary to that mint is taken 3,000 miles away and stored in Philadelphia for coinage, that will necessarily result in a high cost of coinage for the small amount that is permitted to be done at Carson. What I contend is that practically under the appropriation of last year the mint at Carson has been simply turned into an assay office.

The appropriation is a very limited one, and all I ask is the continuation of that appropriation until, at all events, the financial question, which interests this country so much, is settled, so that we may see the pledge of the Republican party for the restoration of the coinage of silver in some form carried out, either by international action or by such form of national action as in their judgment will maintain the two money metals at a parity, or, at all events, until we have witnessed the result of the new search for gold in Nevada, which at present gives most encouraging indications, the product last year, as I am told, being nearly $3,000,000.

This office at Carson under the present appropriation is already made practically an assay office. The appropriation, I believe, calls for only $33,000. It seems to me that, considering the fact that Nevada is to-day either the fourth or the fifth bullion-producing State in this country, it is entitled to this recognition by the Government, and that its requirements can not be properly and wisely met by the Government except by furnishing the customary facilities to the miners of that region. There is already a handsome building there, for which not even a watchman is provided.

Mr. BINGHAM. Provision of that kind will be made in the sundry civil bill, which provides for the care of the public buildings of the country. That is not done in this bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is it proposed that simply an assay office shall be conducted there, or an assay office and a mint?

Mr. NEWLANDS. The proposition is to keep it as a full mint, but the entire appropriation is cut down from the large amount formerly granted to only $30,000.

Mr. BINGHAM. Thirty-two thousand five hundred dollars.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BINGHAM. If the gentleman from Nevada desires five minutes more, I ask unanimous consent that he be allowed to proceed.

There was no objection.

Mr. NEWLANDS. With reference to the silver bullion now at the Philadelphia mint, the Director of the Mint testified that they could not coin it fast enough; that they had to work their men, I believe, from sixteen to eighteen hours a day.

Mr. BINGHAM. That was on the minor coinage.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yet we have that accumulation there under the Sherman Act awaiting coinage; it is impossible to mint that bullion because of the want of mint facilities. In the West we have mint facilities. We have this amount of bullion properly belonging to that region, and the only reason given for the discontinuance of this mint has been that the bullion which we produce has been taken from us to Philadelphia.

Mr. DINGLEY. Before the gentleman takes his seat, I should like to ask a question for information. Is any silver bullion purchased under the Sherman Act coined at the Carson mint?

Mr. NEWLANDS. There has been. I am not aware that there is any now.

Mr. DINGLEY. Then there would be nothing coined there except gold?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I presume so, though I am not informed.

Mr. DINGLEY. Now, at an assay office gold bullion can be deposited and the check of the Government given therefor, just the same as would be done at a mint. The bullion owner gets precisely the same privilege at an assay office as at a mint. When the gold bullion is deposited, he receives a check from the Government at once for the amount of coin which the bullion represents although it is not at once coined. Thus that bullion is practically converted into money at the mint price. The person bringing the bullion there never has to wait for his money until the bullion is coined. The privilege in this respect of the bullion owner is precisely the same at an assay office as at a mint.

Mr. NEWLANDS. If what the gentleman states is done, I think it is very bad policy. I think the man who brings the bullion ought to get the coin which that bullion produces, and he ought to get that coin as near to the point of production as possible. The point of the production of the bullion ought to be the center for the distribution of the money.

Mr. SHAFROTH. As I understand, this bill discontinues the office at Carson City, even as an assay office.

Mr. DINGLEY. I so understand. The object of my inquiry was to ascertain what the amendment proposes. As I understand, the proposition is to have both an assay office and a mint at Carson.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. NEWLANDS. With reference to the gold deposits at Carson, the Director of the Mint says that in the year preceding they amounted to $700,000. Yet at New Orleans, where the same appropriation is made as heretofore, the mint deposits were only $250,000, while at St. Louis they were only from $100,000 to $200,000. From these figures gentlemen can judge the absolute unfairness with which this question has been treated. In consideration of the fact that this whole question of coinage is now awaiting the financial legislation of the next two or three years, it seems to me an unwise thing to close any of the mints of the United States. I submit that they should be continued with their corps of officers, with the full equipment necessary for the work which they are to undertake, and that the Carson mint deserves to have the limited amount asked for.

Mr. FLEMING. Before the gentleman takes his seat, will he allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes, sir.

Mr. FLEMING. As I understand it, the bill as presented by the committee closes the mint at Carson?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No; the assay office.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It closes both the mint and the assay office.

Mr. FLEMING. Now they propose to build a new one at Denver. Is that mint ready to be opened immediately on the closing of the Carson mint?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No, sir.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state, for the information of the gentleman, that the appropriation was made in the Fifty-third Congress for the Denver mint, and plans for the construction of the building have not yet been approved, and not a dollar's worth of work has been done.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nevada has expired.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who has just addressed the House [Mr. NEWLANDS] had something to say about maintaining the Carson mint at its present capacity until such time as the Republican party shall redeem its pledges of the last campaign. The financial pledge of the Republican party was the maintenance of the existing gold standard until such time as it could secure an international agreement to restore silver to its old-time place in our monetary system. Subsequent to the inauguration, President McKinley appointed a commission, under a law theretofore passed by Congress, and sent them with a roving commission to the countries of Europe to secure an international agreement.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. A Committee on Peregrination.

Mr. DOCKERY. Yes, as has been aptly suggested by the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], that commission might properly be styled the Committee on Peregrination. The commission recently returned to this country with a story of disappointment. Its report has not yet been made officially, but it is known of all men that the Governments of Europe refused to join with the United States in an effort to restore silver by international agreement.

Now, then, if the mint at Carson is to be maintained at its present capacity, it can only be accomplished in harmony with the declaration of the Republican party to continue the gold standard.

The coinage under that standard being practically limited to gold, our friends on the other side propose to close the doors of this mint. This is the logic of the Republican platform. This is not all, Mr. Chairman. Having failed to secure the cooperation of foreign nations, the Republican Administration on yesterday gave conclusive evidence of its purpose to fully redeem its monetary pledge. It was a bold, frank, manly avowal by the Secretary of the Treasury, before the Committee on Banking and Currency, in advocacy of a bill which, to quote his language, was intended to more firmly establish the gold standard in the United States.

So, Mr. Chairman, the policy of the Government in respect to assay offices and mints is to be hereafter based on the interpretation of the national Republican platform made by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman from Missouri yield to me for an instant just there?

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly.

Mr. COX. A little while later than yesterday—to-day, in fact—the gentleman having referred to the Secretary's statement—to-day he has gone still further, during the investigation by the committee, in which he states that he is not in opposition to the policy of the Administration on the gold-standard theory.

Mr. DOCKERY. That he is not in opposition to the Administration? Then he is in harmony with the Administration; and the Administration is in accord with the platform, and the platform is a distinct pledge to continue the gold standard until such time as foreign countries can be induced to enter into an arrangement with us to restore bimetallism.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. If the gentleman from Missouri will permit me a moment, I think the gentleman from Tennessee is somewhat mistaken as to just what was said to-day. The Secretary, in reply to a question, said that he thought the views he represented on yesterday were not in conflict with the declaration of the last Republican platform. That was his statement. I think the gentleman from Tennessee has unintentionally misquoted it.

Mr. COX. No; I have the idea right. The question was propounded to the Secretary of the Treasury to-day if he did not think his views were in opposition to the St. Louis platform. He answered, "No," and then went on with a declaration to show that his policy was the same as that embodied in the St. Louis platform.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Yes; but that the other statement was not inconsistent with his views on the national platform.

Mr. COX. But he announced that he was for the gold standard, and in order to press that view he appeared before the committee in the first instance.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Certainly. What I am talking about is what the Secretary said this morning, and there, I think, you unintentionally misstated.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I do not know what the Secretary stated to the committee to-day, but I know what the St. Louis platform declared. I know the action already taken by the President in the seeming endeavor to secure an international agreement. It follows logically that the Republican party must strengthen and maintain the gold standard under the requirements of its platform, the international agreement having utterly failed and gone the way of all the earth, as every honest, intelligent man in the United States expected, and I think that is the view of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I certainly believe in the gold standard, pure and simple.

Mr. DOCKERY. And you are in harmony with the Secretary of the Treasury and the overwhelming majority of your party.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. And I think I am in line with the most progressive spirit of the day, both in this country and abroad. I hope I am.

Mr. DOCKERY. Well, as to that proposition, a contention might arise that would divert me from the line of my argument.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri and Mr. BINGHAM asked unanimous consent that the time of Mr. DOCKERY be extended ten minutes; and there was no objection.

Mr. DOCKERY. Now, Mr. Chairman, it is obvious that the gold standard is to be continued in this country until shortly after the 4th of March, 1901, when a Democratic President will reestablish the rights of silver as a part of the money of the country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And it is well for us to recognize this condition of affairs, so that we may act advisedly in respect to appropriations for assay offices and mints. I did not support the proposition to maintain the assay office at Deadwood, because, in my judgment, an assay office at that point is unnecessary. I did not think the business sufficient to warrant the expense involved in continuing that establishment; but I voted in committee, and shall vote on this floor, against abolishing the mint at Carson.

I will vote here and now to reestablish that mint, although not a dollar may be coined there. I desire that mint fully equipped, even though it has to await the coming of that auspicious period when the free and unlimited coinage of gold and silver will be the policy of the United States under a Democratic Administration in 1901. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. STEELE. That is for the benefit of your children.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is for the benefit of the people, and I generally talk in that behalf.

Something has been said in this debate about the interest of the great West. I hail from the great West, Mr. Chairman. I was born in that section of the country, but if I understand the aspirations and the ambitions and the purposes of its people, they ask no special privileges. They ask and expect to secure under the coming Democratic Administration equality of opportunity. Their interests can not be advanced by enlarging the salary list. What the farmers of my State desire, what the miners demand, what the business men ask, what all our population clamor for, is a larger market for what we produce and a larger volume of money with which to move our products to the markets of the world.

That is the statement of our demands. We ask nothing more, and will be content with nothing less. If you would help the people of the great West, the policy of this Government should be such an one as will remove from every highway of transportation that leads to our markets all obstructive taxation save only that which is essential for an honest and frugal administration. That we shall do under Bryan. I believe, Mr. Chairman, the time is not far distant when prohibitive and restrictive rates of taxation will be repealed, and instead of frittering away our time boasting of our prowess in arms and our achievements in mere physical contests with other countries, we shall, in a contest for commercial supremacy, whip England and other great commercial nations on the high seas and regain our lost commerce. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

That is the desire of the farmers and all our people engaged in productive industries. When that time comes, as it will, when we shall have fully reestablished our old-time prowess upon the seas, when we shall have restored silver to free and unlimited coinage privileges early in 1901, then, Mr. Chairman, the great West will enjoy that equality of opportunity to which it is justly entitled under our form of Government. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, it is very unusual for the gentleman from Missouri, when we have a money bill before the House, bearing what might be called simply the skeleton administration of the Departments, in the sense of its many details—it is very unusual for the gentleman to indulge in what I might call a most interesting and eloquent oration. However, he has gotten the Democratic party into power in 1901! [Applause on the Democratic side.]

And then he has gone a step further and told us that in connection with silver coinage, which is to be entered upon in the future, in one year after 1901, we must establish a mint at Carson City at this time. That was interesting. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. And logical.

Mr. BINGHAM. I want to get back to the facts. Carson City's mint, by the last Congress, in this House, was made an assay office. The bill went to the Senate, and it came back to us with provision for a full mint. The great State which the gentleman represents has but one vote here; the same State has two votes on the other side, and we can readily understand what advantage that has been to the Carson City mint. However, we have taken testimony, which the gentleman from Missouri always regards with considerable force—that is, the statements of the heads of Departments—in everything pertaining to the assay offices and mints, and has followed them.

He sees proper, as he states, in view of the coming millennium and the preparation of Carson City for the coinage that is to come in 1901, that it should be ready now for coinage. The proposition is simply this. The testimony is perfectly clear, and I shall read it, that the Carson City mint has been doing no coinage since 1893; that it is not needed; that the Government does not need it, and that the Treasury Department does not ask it. That is the condition that comes to you in this Committee of the Whole, and that was the same condition presented to you when by a small majority you saw proper to give an assay office at Deadwood.

I submit, Carson City is situated 250 miles from San Francisco. It is off the line of direct transportation, and perhaps that is the reason why one should not be established at Carson City. There is now stored at San Francisco $20,000,000 or $30,000,000 of coined silver dollars that can not be put into circulation. A few years ago the Government had to transport from San Franscisco to the East upward of $20,000,000 of gold in order that it might be placed in circulation, so that it might be placed in the business centers of trade and active movement. That is the condition of the San Francisco mint. You do not need a mint at Carson City in full operation.

Should Congress change its political complexion prior to this 1901, in one session of Congress Carson City mint could be put into operation; but we do not need it to-day. I will refer to the appropriations that have been made. In 1893 we appropriated $99,558; in 1894, $104,000; in 1895, $40,000; in 1896, $40,000; in 1897, $39,600, and in 1898, $32,300.

The gentleman's amendment proposes the same allowance for Carson City for the next fiscal year as it stands in the current year. Your Committee on Appropriations eliminates Carson City mint as a place of mintage or coinage, as well as an assay office, an assay office being contiguous, in San Francisco. Now, your Director of the Mint makes this statement——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the gentleman allow me to make an inquiry? The gentleman stated that Carson City was off the line of travel.

Mr. BINGHAM. Off the line of the main railroad.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to inform him that there is a continuous line of railroads, stretching from the north to the south, on the eastern side of the Sierra Nevadas, of over 450 miles, consisting of three railroads, and these are all contributory to Carson, and they all penetrate mining regions of great value and importance, mining regions whose production is being stimulated every day.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have no desire to controvert the gentleman's statement. I say it is off the main line.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It is off the Central Pacific, that is true; but it is within 25 miles of that.

Mr. BINGHAM. In reference to the Carson City mint the question is put to Mr. Preston, and the answer of that gentleman is:

> It is absolutely useless as a mint, and that is all there is about it. There is no use for it in the world, as it is but a short distance to San Francisco. * * *
> There have been no coinage operations conducted there since 1893, and the amount of bullion deposited is not sufficient to justify its continuance as a mint. The deposits last year of gold, I think, were about $700,000 only, and we do not get enough bullion to carry on parting and refining operations, and we have had on several occasions to furlough all the force on account of the lack of work.
> * * * * * * *
> Mr. LIVINGSTON. Could you not abolish the whole thing, even as an assay office?
>
> Mr. PRESTON. I have recommended its discontinuation as a mint, and last year the committee put it upon a basis of an assay office, and it goes over to the other side and they appropriate for a mint, and so it goes.
>
> * * * * * * *
> Mr. MOODY. Your view would be, then, the whole thing should be abolished as an assay office as well as a mint?
>
> Mr. PRESTON. It should be abolished and the building donated to the State or sold.
> The CHAIRMAN. Right in that connection, do you anticipate for the next fiscal year much or any work at that mint?
> Mr. PRESTON. No; I do not. We had to depend upon the Comstock mines, and they are pretty well worked out. It is off the line of the railroad, and very little of bullion produced in the rest of the State comes in.

Gentlemen, you have the proposition of the committee. I read you briefly that which governed the committee. We believed on both sides, from the commencement to the end of our work on the bill, that we had but one duty to perform in preparing it for the House—that was to submit a bill wherein the administration of the public affairs of this Government should move easily, safely, and expeditiously. We cut off wherever we saw excessive appropriations, not only in this instance, but elsewhere.

This mint at Carson has practically fallen into disuse. It is no longer of use to the Government, and therefore should not be maintained as a mint in active operation. It will have watchmen for its protection under the sundry civil bill, which takes care of the public buildings, but as a minting operative establishment it is no longer needed. No more mints are needed on the Pacific Coast. This mint is close to San Francisco, and economy dictated that we should submit the proposition in this form to the House.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I have no disposition whatever to divert the discussion from the point that is being considered, but I have a desire, so far as my information goes in regard to the matter, that the absolute and plain truth should be known and understood. The Secretary of the Treasury was before the Committee on Banking and Currency by invitation this morning, and I take this occasion to say that of all the men I have heard examined before that committee none was or could have been more distinct and open and candid than he was. His statement was a relief, because it was so strongly in contrast with some of the hearings before that committee.

However anybody may differ with him in opinion, there was and there is no difficulty whatever in understanding his position. He avows that he is committed to the gold standard, as it is understood, and not only that, but the whole bill framed by the distinguished Secretary is based on that idea. A question was put to him which emanated not from the minority, but from a majority member of the committee, in which he was asked whether his views were in accord with the views of the President, and he answered "Yes." Then, with an explanation of that answer, he came back to the same conclusion, that his views and the President's views accorded on the financial question. Now, I desire to say, with a frankness like his own, that there is no longer any possible dispute as to the position of the Republican party.

If the Secretary of the Treasury understands the views of the President and if he expressed them in the hearing this morning, there is no longer any room for difference of opinion as to the position of the Republican party. The issue is plain, the gold standard against bimetallism, and a number of gentlemen on that committee have had the frankness to admit it. This being so, why discuss the matter? Why try to shift? Why try to raise any doubt about it? That is the issue presented by the Secretary of the Treasury and, as he says, indorsed by the President of the United States. Now we understand it exactly. I do not think my friend from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] will take any issue with me upon this point. The Secretary, as I have said, made an explanation of his answer, but that his conclusion was in accordance with that of the President he emphatically announced.

May I be permitted to say just here, in passing, without intending to go into that discussion at present, that these views of the Secretary of the Treasury were well understood in advance, and that everybody knew he was a gold-standard man?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Will the gentleman permit me a word?

Mr. COX. With pleasure.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I do not think it is anything to the discredit of the Secretary of the Treasury that he is a gold-standard man, if he be such, but I simply want to state my version of what occurred in the committee this morning. I did not hear anyone ask the Secretary whether he was in harmony with the President on this subject or not, nor did I hear the name or the official title of the President mentioned at all.

Mr. COX. I will give you the language of the question, if you will allow me.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Just permit me to finish my statement. The Secretary of the Treasury was asked how the views he had expressed with respect to his own bill tallied with the declarations of the Republican party in its national convention at St. Louis upon the subject of the money standard, and his answers were directed to that question, and the name or the official title of the President of the United States was at no time mentioned in anything that was said.

Mr. COX. Well, I did not suppose I was called on to assert the proposition that the President of the United States was elected on the St. Louis platform.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Oh, the gentleman certainly understands me. He certainly can not misunderstand me.

Mr. COX. I do understand you, beyond question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. The question is not what the Secretary's views are on this subject, but what he said before the committee this morning.

Mr. SHAFROTH was recognized.

Mr. COX. One word, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado has the floor.

Mr. COX. I ask the gentleman to allow me one word. The Secretary said that his views were not in conflict with the principles announced in the St. Louis platform.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. That is exactly what I have stated.

Mr. COX. And I am certainly entitled to assume that the views of the President are in accord with the platform on which he was elected.

Mr. CLAYTON. And which the President indorsed in his letter of acceptance.

Mr. COX. Accepted it and indorsed it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much that we should be drawn off from the merits of this measure by a discussion as to whether the Secretary of the Treasury approves of a certain policy or not. We have now under consideration the question whether it is wise to continue a mint and assay office at Carson City, Nev. If so, it ought to be continued.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania has stated that very little bullion is minted at Carson City. In answer to that I might say that it seems to have been the policy of past Administrations not to mint it there.

Mr. BINGHAM. That work was done at Carson City for four years.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That may be. But whether there has been much or little mintage there recently, it is nevertheless a fact that a large quantity of both silver and gold is produced in that part of the country, and it is much more convenient to mint it there than to ship it to Philadelphia——

Mr. BINGHAM. But it is coined also at San Francisco.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Or San Francisco either. Now, it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, there ought to be a mint in the interior of this country—not merely at San Francisco and at Philadelphia. Congress has deemed it wise to establish a mint at Denver; but that will not be in operation for perhaps four or five years; and until that mint is in operation it seems to me there is no excuse for abandoning this mint at Carson City. It lies east of the Sierra Nevada Mountains, a natural barrier between the inhabitants of the interior and of the Pacific Coast. It is the only mint in operation between San Francisco and Philadelphia.

Now, there is one fact to which I want to call attention. We all concede, no matter what may be our views on the financial question, that at the present time too much money is congested at the money centers of the East. What is the cause of this? Not solely, perhaps, the establishment of the mint at Philadelphia, though I do submit that is one of the elements assisting in this congestion of money in the Eastern money markets. I maintain that the establishment of mints in the interior would have a tendency to remove this congestion. There is no person in the United States, I presume, who does not believe it would be wise to have some relief of the existing condition, to have some of the money concentrated at Eastern centers used in the interior of the country. The Secretary of the Treasury acknowledges that there ought to be relief, and has proposed plans to remedy this condition.

Various members who have spoken on both sides of this Chamber say there ought to be relief. Now, the establishment of a mint and the coinage of money in the interior of the country tends to retain a larger proportion of that money there than if you ship the bullion to the East and have it minted there. Naturally a large part of the money is retained in that part of the country where the mint is located. Inasmuch as it is universally conceded that some relief in this direction is desirable, it seems to me that to abandon or abolish this mint, not only as a mint, but as an assay office, would be a great wrong to the people of the West.

Mr. OGDEN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the House to the report of the Director of the Mint for the years 1895 and 1896, showing the number of pieces of money coined at our principal mints. I think when we examine these statistics we shall get down to the real "milk in the cocoanut" and find out why our friends in Pennsylvania and Philadelphia are standing up so strongly for the continuance of the mint at Philadelphia, and why in this bill they bring in a proposition to discontinue the mint at New Orleans.

It is not the amount of the coinage of gold or silver that cuts a figure in this matter; it is the 5-cent pieces, the nickel pieces, the 1-cent pieces, the bronze cents. Here is the report of the Director of the Mint for 1895-96, showing the number of gold and silver pieces coined at Philadelphia, San Francisco, and New Orleans, respectively. Every sensible man in this House must know that it costs about as much, so far as the mechanical labor is concerned, to coin a cent as to coin a twenty-dollar gold piece. It is the number of pieces coined that we must consider.

In 1895 there were coined at Philadelphia 43,958,601 pieces of money; in San Francisco, 8,401,011; in New Orleans, 7,251,500. Not satisfied with this, we find that in 1896 the number of pieces coined was increased in Philadelphia and decreased in San Francisco and New Orleans.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman allow me one moment——

Mr. OGDEN. I prefer not to be interrupted now. I am stating the facts, and I know they hurt; but I can not help that.

In 1896 there were coined at Philadelphia 69,487,295 pieces of money; at San Francisco, 3,291,478; at New Orleans, 5,552,000.

Now, let us see the number of pieces of gold and silver, exclusive of minor coins, coined at these three mints during those two years. In 1895 there were coined at Philadelphia, exclusive of minor coins, 8,871,299 pieces of gold and silver; at San Francisco, 8,401,011; at New Orleans, 7,251,500. In 1896, in this effort to concentrate the coinage at Philadelphia, the coinage both of New Orleans and San Francisco was reduced. In 1895, before this scheme was put in operation, there was coined almost an equal amount of pieces of money at San Francisco, New Orleans, and Philadelphia. In 1896 there were coined at Philadelphia, in round numbers, 15,000,000; at San Francisco, 3,000,000, and at New Orleans 5,000 000.

Mr. BINGHAM. Just a single statement. It will be observed that the report speaks of pieces of money.

Mr. OGDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BINGHAM. Under the law, running, I think, for fifty years or perhaps longer, the Philadelphia mint is the only one designated to coin the penny and the 5-cent piece.

Mr. OGDEN. Well, it is about time we changed that law and divided some of this chicken pie around amongst the other mints.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am not discussing that question, but I am simply answering the statement of the gentleman, and showing why there has been more of this class of coinage in the Philadelphia mint than at the other mints.

Mr. OGDEN. Well, the House and the country ought to know the reason for it.

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly the House and the country probably do know the reason. But the gentleman himself knows that Philadelphia is the only mint under the law where that character of coinage is allowed.

Mr. OGDEN. Then when we are changing the law and doing away with the New Orleans mint entirely we will ask the privilege of coining some of it ourselves, and not place the whole of this business in the city of Philadelphia.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OGDEN. With the consent of the committee, I should like to have five minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman will proceed.

There was no objection.

Mr. OGDEN. Now, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] laid great stress, in the course of his remarks, on the poor farmer, the agriculturists, the men who are raising the cotton and the corn and other agricultural crops throughout the country. He said that it was as fair to pay for the transportation of their products to New York and other markets as it was to transport this bullion.

Here is a long list of minor coins, which have been sent out all over the country from the mint at Philadelphia in 1896. It affords very interesting reading, and I desire to call the attention of members to it. I note, however, that it does not say anything about the cost of sending the coins out. Of course it was the small coins, the nickel and the cent, but I find that $5,830 have been shipped clear across the continent to California in 5-cent pieces; and $2,655 in cents also shipped clear across the continent, when they could have minted them there in San Francisco and saved the transportation.

Mr. LOUD. Oh, but the gentleman should be honest. There is no use in trying to deceive ourselves in these things. He must be aware of the fact that there is no machinery in the San Francisco mint for such coinage, and that it would cost a great deal of money to put it in. Let us be fair with each other. Besides that, there is no law for it.

Mr. OGDEN. I understand that; but while you are correcting the law, while you are making law to do away with the mint, for I know that you Republicans are going to discontinue the mint in New Orleans, why not do something to correct the inequalities that exist and treat all parts of the country alike, in common fairness? We do not understand that it costs so many hundreds of thousand or millions of dollars to put in the necessary coinage machinery to make dimes, and nickels, and cents.

Mr. LOUD. It will cost about a million and a half dollars to establish the plant.

Mr. OGDEN. Possibly it may; but suppose it did. It would probably be a saving in the long run. All the minor coins are shipped and distributed over every State in the Union from Montana, North Dakota, and all along the line. I see they sent down to Texas $13,990 in 5-cent pieces; in cents about the same proportion, and then to the State of Montana, where they receive $5,980 in nickel pieces that ought to be coined right there.

Now, in response to my friend from California, I know that they have not got the machinery to do that work in the San Francisco mint. But why should they not have it? Why should they not have it in New Orleans; or why do away with the mint there? Why not appropriate more money to build up the mint at Denver; and why should the entire preparation of the minor coins go to the mint at Philadelphia?

Mr. GAINES. How old is the mint in New Orleans?

Mr. OGDEN. It is one of the oldest mints in the country.

Mr. GAINES. Is there any reason for not putting in the machinery?

Mr. OGDEN. Well, my friend from California says that it will cost a million and a half dollars. That seems to me to be a tolerably large estimate. I do not know whether he is an expert or not, but it seems to me that he is a little off on that.

Mr. BLAND. They have the machinery now. All that would be necessary is the preparation of the dies.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. If they have not got the machinery, all they would need to do would be to ship some of this out to the West.

Mr. OGDEN. The real "milk in the cocoanut" is the retention of the minor coinage in Philadelphia; and that will go on whether we are on the gold or the silver standard, for they are up and early to prevent anything that will deprive them of what they now possess. It is, after all, the "early bird that catches the worm."

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. NEWLANDS. I only ask for a moment in which to say there are really only three mints now in operation, the San Francisco mint, the Philadelphia mint, and the Carson mint. The Denver mint is not yet in operation, and will not be for a year or more. The Carson mint is the only one that is established within the five or six mining States which produce all the bullion of the country. An appropriation of only $32,500 is asked in order to maintain this mint. The country is separated from San Francisco and the California coast by the Sierra Nevada Mountains, which constitute a natural division. There are no difficulties whatever with reference to transportation to the Carson mint, and the mining regions absolutely tributary to that mint are sufficient to sustain the operations that are asked for.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. CANNON. I want to ask what it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Nevada.

Mr. CANNON. Is it to appropriate for the mint at Carson City?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I only want to say one thing, and then I am ready for a vote. I wish to vote whatever is necessary for the public service, and would like to vote for a mint, if it is necessary. I do not blame the gentleman from Nevada, with all my esteem for him, for wanting this appropriation made. If I were in his place, I should do that, because this is a representative government. Now, here is a mint away out there in the mountains, in a great center of population. [Laughter.] Why, there are nearly 45,000 people in that magnificent State; and this is an appropriation of $39,000 for a mint, or nearly $1 to each inhabitant. Now, I do not think that is necessary for mint purposes. Perhaps, though, as one of the industries out there, it might be apt. [Laughter.]

Mr. NEWLANDS. It is true the population of Nevada is sparse. I once appeared before the Attorney-General to urge the appointment of a distinguished judge from Nevada as circuit judge on that coast. He looked at me rather quizically, and he said: "Mr. NEWLANDS, don't you think that Nevada has had enough, considering the sparseness of her population?" My answer was, "No; not if you consider the brains of her men." And I ask for this as a tribute to the intelligence of Nevada. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS].

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask for the reading of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment again, without objection.

The amendment was again read.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. NEWLANDS) there were—ayes 80, noes 82.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chairman appointed Mr. BINGHAM and Mr. NEWLANDS.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 83, noes 77.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I will state for the information of the committee that we have now completed all the paragraphs of the bill with the exception of the paragraph covering the Civil Service Commission. In view of the fact, which is well known to the House, that the discussion upon the paragraph covering the Civil Service Commission promises to be somewhat exhaustive, it has been agreed that we should have general debate reasonably limited in time.

As the hour is now so late, and as immediately after the reading of the Journal to-morrow, if I am correctly informed, memorial services will occur, I suggest, and assume that there will be no objection, that the debate as to this paragraph go over until after the holiday recess.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Then how much time is to be given for debate on the civil-service section?

Mr. BINGHAM. I should think a week.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Plenty of time.

Mr. BINGHAM. Whatever the House agrees to.

Mr. DOCKERY. I understand the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] in charge of the bill that it is not contemplated to have any debate to-morrow on the civil-service paragraph.

Mr. BINGHAM. As I understand that immediately after the reading of the Journal memorial services will take place, and then the recess, that will take it over until the 5th of January, and I give notice that immediately after the reading of the Journal on the 5th of January it is my purpose to call up this bill for consideration.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, before departing from the subject which was just under discussion, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. No amendments are in order now.

Mr. KING. I should like to have it read, and then you can raise the point of order if you wish to.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have no objection to it being read for information.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill has been read, and of course no amendment is now in order except by unanimous consent.

Mr. KING. I ask unanimous consent for the reading of the amendment and for its consideration.

Mr. BINGHAM. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Let the amendment be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment, subject to the point of order made.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add on page 60, after line 6, the following:

"Assay office at Salt Lake City, Utah: For the establishment of an assay office at Salt Lake City, Utah, the sum of $25,000; for assayer in charge, $2,250; melter, $1,800; chief clerk, $1,800; clerk, $1,400."

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I must insist on my point of order, that at this time it is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask that there may be inserted in the RECORD as a part of the proceedings a letter from the Interstate Commerce Commission, through their secretary, with reference to leaves of absence.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, December 14, 1897.

DEAR SIR: I find on examination that some Executive Departments replied to your inquiry of November 30, 1897, by reports covering the calendar year

1893. The report made by this commission in response to that inquiry was based upon the present year up to the date of reply, because apparently so called for by your communication. It appears from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that these replies are to be printed as part of the investigation made by your committee. The sick-leave figures for the commission are for one time and those for the above-named Departments are for another. For these reasons, I desire to correct the report made for the commission on December 7, 1897, by the following statement:

During the calendar year 1896 the commission had 131 persons employed, of whom 57 were granted some sick leave over the thirty days so-called annual leave allowed by law, and the average time so allowed for these 57 persons was 12.98 days. This includes one employee who was seriously injured by a falling building during the cyclone, which was regarded as coming within the meritorious and exceptional cases in which extended sick leave may be granted by law. The 57 persons so allowed sick leave in addition to annual leave were 43.51 per cent of the whole number of 131 employees.

The above-stated figures for the commission for that year are an average of 12.98 days of sick leave to 57 persons out of a total number of 131, or 43.51 per cent of the total employed.

In addition to this, the time and number of persons reported in my letter of December 7 is incorrectly stated, as there were but 24 persons who availed of thirty days' annual leave and any sick leave in addition, an average of 19.37 days. Only 19½ per cent of those employed availed of thirty days' annual and any sick leave.

Very respectfully, EDW. A. MOSELEY, Secretary.

Hon. HENRY H. BINGHAM,
Chairman Subcommittee, etc., Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOPKINS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 4751, and had come to no resolution thereon.

DECREE PROPOSED TO BE ISSUED BY THE MINISTER OF THE UNITED STATES AT PEKIN.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message of the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State, submitting, for the required revision of Congress, a decree proposed to be issued by the minister of the United States at Pekin, under section 4086 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

WILLIAM MCKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, December 16, 1897.

APPEAL FOR INDEMNITY TO OWNERS AND MASTER OF THE NORWEGIAN STEAMSHIP NICARAGUA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message of the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith, for such action as Congress may deem proper to take, a report from the Secretary of State and accompanying correspondence relating to the appeal for indemnity addressed to the equitable consideration of the Government of the United States by the owners and late master of the Norwegian steamship Nicaragua.

WILLIAM MCKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, December 16, 1897.

The SPEAKER. The message and accompanying papers will be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, is this a claim preferred against the Government?

The SPEAKER. It is a request for equitable consideration on a matter which happened in a foreign port, the Chair understands. It is not quite clear. The letter of the Secretary of State might be read. It shows the nature of the matter.

The letter was read, as follows:

To the President:

I have the honor to submit for transmission to Congress, should it be deemed proper to do so, correspondence between the legation of Sweden and Norway at Washington and this Department in regard to the appeal for indemnity addressed to the equitable consideration of the United States by the owners and the late master of the Norwegian steamship Nicaragua.

The circumstances of the case, as stated by the minister of Sweden and Norway, are as follows:

On August 14, 1894, the vessel was about to sail from Bluefields, Nicaragua, for Mobile, Ala., with a cargo of bananas, when Mr. John McCafferty, an American citizen, residing in Bluefields, came on board and begged the master to take him to Mobile, or to transfer him to the U. S. S. Columbia, which was then lying off that port.

Mr. McCafferty claimed that his life was in danger owing to the internal disturbances then prevailing in Bluefields. It is alleged that the Norwegian captain informed the officer in command of the United States war vessel of the fugitive's desire, but that that officer was unwilling to receive him.

Under these circumstances the Norwegian master agreed to transport Mr. McCafferty to Mobile as an act of humanity. He appears to have been aware that carrying the passenger rendered his vessel liable to quarantine, but to have presumed that the exceptional circumstances of the case would be taken into consideration and the quarantine not enforced.

On arriving at Mobile the vessel was quarantined for five days and her cargo of fruit damaged. A lawsuit between the charterers of the vessel and her owners followed, the latter losing their case both in the United States district and circuit courts, to the latter of which courts the master appealed the case at his own expense.

The total loss to the owners is claimed to have been $4,926.67 and to the master $750, who, in addition, lost his place as a result of his action.

The owners of the steamship and the late master are aware that they have no legal claim against the United States Government, but in view of their allegations that their losses were incurred through assistance lent to an American citizen whose life was threatened, they appeal, through their diplomatic representative, for relief to the equitable and kindly consideration of that Government.

Respectfully submitted.

JOHN SHERMAN.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 15, 1897.

Mr. DINGLEY. It seems to be a private claim by a foreigner, transmitted through the minister of some foreign government.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that perhaps it will have to go to the Committee on Claims, under the rules, and therefore changes the direction and orders the message and accompanying papers to be printed and referred to the Committee on Claims.

JUDSON JONES.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4847) for the relief of Judson Jones.

Be it enacted, etc., That the copyright of Judson Jones, a citizen of the United States residing in the State of Minnesota, in and to a book entitled "The Alphabet of Orthoepy," originally published in 1870, is hereby declared valid to all intents and purposes, and the said Judson Jones, author of said book, is hereby authorized to file with the Librarian of Congress the title thereof as it appears in the printed book aforesaid, and such filing is hereby made and declared a valid filing if made at any time between the passage of this act and the 11th day of January, 1898, and the extension of copyright for the succeeding fourteen years obtained thereon is hereby declared a valid copyright.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 13, after the word "copyright," insert the words "obtained thereon:" in line 14 strike out the word "succeeding:" and also, in the same line, strike out the words "obtained thereon" and insert the following: "Following the said 11th day of January, 1893."

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, this injures no one——

Mr. DINGLEY. Before consent is given for consideration, I desire to inquire, has this been reported from the Committee on Patents?

Mr. HICKS. It has been unanimously reported by the Committee on Patents. I move the present consideration and adoption of the bill.

Mr. BAILEY. I do not understand that unanimous consent has been given yet.

Mr. HICKS. I now ask unanimous consent.

Mr. BAILEY. I understand.

The SPEAKER. The bill is submitted to the House for unanimous consent.

Mr. BAILEY. I reserve the right to object. I want to hear some good reason for this before assent is given.

Mr. HICKS. Then I will ask that the report be read, Mr. Speaker, which fully explains the purpose of the bill and the relief desired. My friend Mr. MCCLEARY can fully and satisfactorily, I am sure, explain to the House why immediate action is asked for and desired.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4847) for the relief of Judson Jones, submit the following report:

On January 11, 1870, Judson Jones, a citizen of the United States, then and now residing in the State of Minnesota, filed in the office of the clerk of the United States district court for the district of Minnesota, at the city of St. Paul, in said State, the title-page of a little spelling book, in the words following, to wit: "The Alphabet of Orthoepy and Its Application to Monosyllables, by Judson Jones."

As author and proprietor of said book, Mr. Jones entered into a contract with the St. Paul Press Printing Company by which said company undertook to print for and deliver to him an edition of 20,000 copies of said book within three months of the filing of said title-page, three months being then the legal time limit within which any copyrighted book must be published, dating from the filing of the title-page, or else the copyright was held void and invalid under the law. But the printing company before named did not keep its contract, and it was more than six months from the date of filing of said title-page before said printing company began the printing of said book, and it was some time in August, 1870, before the above-mentioned edition was ready for publication.

In the meantime, some weeks before the publication of said book, the copyright law was amended so as to require all title-pages to be filed thenceforth with the Librarian of Congress, and the two copies theretofore required to be filed within ten days of the publication of any copyrighted book with a clerk of the United States district court were now to be filed with the Librarian of Congress.

Immediately on the publication of his book, Mr. Jones forwarded the two copies thereof to the Librarian of Congress, together with the copyright fee required. Hearing nothing from the Librarian of Congress, Mr. Jones forwarded a statement of his case to Mr. W. C. Dodge, solicitor of patents, Washington, D. C., from whom he learned that the Librarian had no power to correct the defect in the copyright resulting from the failure to file the two copies of the book within the three months of filing the title-page, as required by law, and that Congress alone could correct such defect. On this information, verified by examination of the United States copyright laws, Judge McMillan, then a United States Senator from the State of Minnesota, promised to introduce a bill for the relief of Mr. Jones. But he never did.

Later his successor in the United States Senate, Hon. CUSHMAN K. DAVIS, looked the matter up for Mr. Jones and wrote him a letter inclosing a brief statement from the Librarian of Congress, Mr. Spofford, which asserted that Mr. Jones needed no relief, because the record of the clerk of the United States district court for the district of Minnesota showed a full compliance with the law; that the said record was by law conclusive, and that the copyright of Mr. Jones was therefore perfect and valid to all intents and purposes.

In case of violation of his copyright Mr. Jones would be required, in any suit for damages, to verify the record under oath. He, being a conscientious man and being aware that the record was wrong, could not and would not do so. His copyright, therefore, though valid and protective in form, is not so in fact.

The first period of his copyright under the law (twenty-eight years) will expire January 11, 1898. Mr. Jones desires to avail himself of the privilege granted by law of renewing the copyright for fourteen years thereafter. He naturally desires during those fourteen years the full protection of the law. To secure him such protection is the purpose of H. R. 4847. Believing that he is entitled to such protection, the Committee on Patents approve the bill, and recommend that it do pass, with the phrase following "ninety-eight," in line 13, amended so as to read, "and the extension of copyright obtained thereon for the fourteen years following the said 11th day of January, 1898, is hereby declared a valid copyright."

Mr. BAILEY. Can the gentleman who reports this bill tell us whether or not the author of this book ever attempted to make the publishing company that failed to keep its contract respond in damages? Was there any lawsuit or attempt to recover? It is perfectly plain that there could have been a recovery if suit had been brought.

Mr. HICKS. I will ask my friend from Minnesota [Mr. McCLEARY] to answer that question, as he is more familiar with the case than I am.

Mr. McCLEARY. Mr. Speaker, my answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Texas is, No. In the first place, this old gentleman is not a very good business man; in the second place, he had a long period of sickness in his family, which occupied his attention so completely that he did not give much attention to business. He is a poor man, and he could not afford to employ counsel, as he thought, and for all these reasons the answer to the gentleman's question is, No.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not see how anybody can be very seriously injured by the passage of this bill, although I think it would be a bad precedent. I think that in a case of this kind, where a man makes a contract with people that they shall comply with certain requirements of law and they fail to do so, he ought to compel them to respond in damages, instead of coming to Congress and asking for an extension of copyright.

Mr. HICKS. This is his only remedy.

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, there was another ample remedy. If these people contracted with him to print his book and to comply with the requirements of the law, and if they failed to keep their contract, his remedy was an easy one. There might have been some difficulty in ascertaining the extent of damages; but that is a difficulty which arises in a great many cases.

Mr. HICKS. But the object of this bill is to cure the defect in his copyright.

Mr. BAILEY. I am not going to persist in the objection or waste the time of the House in discussing it, but I think this is loose legislation.

Mr. LOUD. I would like to ask whether this man has not had the benefit of the copyright now for twenty-eight years?

Mr. HICKS. No, sir.

Mr. McCLEARY. He is entitled to an extension for fourteen years under the law, and during those years he wants to have a real protection. That is all there is of this bill.

Mr. LOUD. Why can not he go and get it?

Mr. McCLEARY. Because the record is wrong, and if he attempted to take the case into court he would have to swear that it was right, which he is not willing to do.

Mr. LOUD. But if the record was right he would be entitled to the additional fourteen years?

Mr. McCLEARY. Certainly. He gets no rights by this bill that he would not have if the company had supplied him with the books in compliance with the law. This bill gives him no new rights. Mr. Speaker, I move the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, the bill is put upon its passage. I would like to inquire whether it may not conflict with some other rights now existing on the part of other people who may have this book in print? Whether or not there is any likelihood of what we are asked to do here causing damage to people who have not been heard in this matter? There may possibly be some conflict of right or interest involved in the case about which Congress knows nothing. I do not know anything about it, but I think we ought to be a little cautious in passing bills of this character.

Mr. McCLEARY. There never was a copy of this book published except the original edition of 20,000, and the bill conflicts with no one's rights. It simply gives to this old man a right which he would have had under the law if the company had complied with their contract. It is no new right, no right that he would not have under the law if he were willing to swear that the record is correct; but he is not willing to do that. It is simply a matter of conscience with him.

The amendments recommended in the report were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HICKS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITION AT OMAHA.

Mr. MERCER. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the joint resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 106) extending limit of cost of the Government building or buildings at the Trans-Mississippi and International Exposition at Omaha, Nebr., and reducing cost of Government exhibit.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be constructed and completed, at an additional cost not to exceed $10,000, the Government building at the Trans-Mississippi and International Exposition at Omaha, Nebr., as shown and called for by the plans, drawings, and specifications on which bids were taken for its erection, etc., and that the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, further authorized and directed to cause to be erected at said exposition a building for an exhibit of the United States Life-Saving Service, at a cost not to exceed for said building the sum of $2,500; and to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to give effect to and execute the provisions of this act, the limit of cost of the Government building or buildings authorized to be erected at said exposition is hereby extended from $50,000 to $62,500; and the cost of the Government exhibit at said exposition is hereby reduced from $150,000 to $137,500.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this resolution?

Mr. BAILEY. Reserving the right to object, I wish to ask a question. I understand this is simply a proposition to spend a little more money on the buildings at this exposition and a little less on the exhibits. Is that correct?

Mr. MERCER. In one sense it is, and in another sense it is not. When the estimates for the Government building at the Omaha Exposition were made by the Treasury Department, and the plans drawn and the bids offered, it was found that the lowest bid was higher than the estimates of the Treasury Department. In order to bring the lowest bid within the contract price, as stipulated by legislation, to wit, $50,000, the Treasury Department was obliged to lessen the length of the Government building to the extent of about 110 feet.

Now, this joint resolution provides for transferring part of the appropriation of $150,000 set apart for the exhibit to the Government building, so as to allow the building to be constructed as originally planned. The plans in the Treasury Department are awaiting action of this kind on the part of Congress, which would leave the building in harmony with the general plan and scope of all the exposition buildings.

I believe it to be a fact that in connection with these exhibitions and expositions too much money has generally been expended for traveling expenses, subsistence, and salaries. I think that by an amended bill, which is being considered by the Ways and Means Committee, the expenses in this direction at the Omaha Exposition can be reduced, so that in the future the Government can be saved a very considerable expense. It will be observed that this resolution does not call for any increased appropriation.

Mr. BAILEY. I am perfectly willing that a part of the appropriation for the exhibit should be transferred to the building. My only anxiety is that the Government should not be required to spend any more money there——

Mr. MERCER. It will not be.

Mr. BAILEY. Because I remember having prophesied when the original bill was passed that the Government would be called upon to spend more money than was then authorized.

Mr. MERCER. We are not asking for it.

Mr. BAILEY. All I want is the gentleman's statement that this resolution simply proposes to charge against one account $12,500 which otherwise would have been charged against another account, the aggregate of the two accounts being left precisely the same.

Mr. MERCER. That is the fact.

Mr. DOCKERY. We hope to effect a considerable saving to the Government by the reduction of salaries and traveling expenses.

Mr. BAILEY. I do not understand that the present proposition is merely a matter of "hope." I believe the resolution explicitly provides that the $12,500 to be added to the building fund shall be subtracted from the other fund.

Mr. MERCER. The gentleman is correct; and I desire to say in addition that the figures in the Treasury Department show that the management of the Atlanta Exposition covered back into the Treasury $12,000; the management of the Nashville Exposition will cover back $10,000; and it is hoped that under the regulations which the Ways and Means Committee are preparing the management of the Omaha Exposition can cover back twice the latter amount.

Mr. BAILEY. Inasmuch as these expositions are becoming a regular industry of the country, I am glad that those who manage them are improving in the matter of expenditure. [Laughter.]

Mr. DINGLEY. One word. I should have preferred if this bill, before coming up for action, had gone to a committee for careful examination and report in connection with the limitations as to expenditures for Government exhibits. But as the gentleman thinks it desirable that the bill should pass before the holidays, in order that the construction of the building may proceed without delay, I shall make no objection, if it is the distinct understanding that the aggregate expenditure shall not exceed the $250,000 limited in the bill——

Mr. MERCER. Two hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. DINGLEY. And that the bill now pending before the Ways and Means Committee shall be amended so as certainly to secure that end.

Mr. LOUD. I hope the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MERCER] will agree to that.

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman from Nebraska has not said that he assents.

Mr. LOUD. I hope the gentleman will agree that he will not come to Congress for any increased appropriation for this Omaha Exposition.

Mr. MERCER. I am anxious for a vote on this resolution——

Mr. LOUD. Unless the gentleman will give the House some assurance of that kind in answer to the very courteous suggestion of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], I shall object.

Mr. MERCER. What kind of assurance does the gentleman wish?

Mr. LOUD. Let the gentleman answer the question propounded by the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. MERCER. As indicated in my remarks before the gentleman from Maine obtained the floor, I am laboring now to save the Government some money, and I think, if the gentleman from California will not obstruct me, I shall save more money than if he does obstruct me.

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman say to the House now that he will not urge or ask Congress to appropriate any more money for this Omaha Exposition?

Mr. MERCER. Well, Mr. Speaker, acting under duress—this being a sort of "hold up"—I suppose I shall have to agree to it. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman to agree to it. [Laughter.] Is there objection to the consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution H. Res. 105; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MERCER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

(S. 2793.) An act for the purchase or construction of a vessel for the Revenue-Cutter Service on the Yukon River, Alaska—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

(S. 2764.) An act for the relief of the heirs of Pom K. Soh, deceased—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

COMMITTEE ON MILEAGE.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. BARHAM as chairman of the Committee on Mileage.

And then, on motion of Mr. PAYNE (at 5 o'clock p. m.), the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the case of V. J. Smith against The United States—to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting copy of a paper purporting to be the objections of the Choctaw-Chickasaw Union party to the agreement between commissioners of the United States to negotiate with the Five Civilized Tribes and the commissioners on the part of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians—to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 2484) giving the assent of Congress to a change of the compact entered into between the United States and the State of Arkansas on her admission into the Union, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 66); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. EDDY, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 4221) to confirm certain cash entries of public lands, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 67); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CUMMINGS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the joint resolution of the House (H. Res. 24) relative to the medal of honor authorized by the acts of December 21, 1861, and July 16, 1862, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 68); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. DANFORD, from the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 1) to amend the immigration laws of the United States, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 69); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of bills of the following titles; which were thereupon referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4988) granting a pension to James Wolf—Committee on Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 5051) granting a pension to Emily M. Gillespie—Committee on Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 355) for the relief of Mathias Pedersen—Committee on Military Affairs discharged, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS INTRODUCED.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BRADLEY: A bill (H. R. 5355) to convey to the city of New York, in the State of New York, for the purpose of a public park, the island known as Governors Island, with the buildings thereon erected—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CALLAHAN: A bill (H. R. 5356) to create the office of surveyor-general in Oklahoma and Indian Territories—to the Committee on the Territories.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5357) to provide for town-site entries of lands in Oklahoma Territory, and to repeal an act entitled "An act to provide for town-site entries of lands in what is known as 'Oklahoma,' and for other purposes," approved May 14, 1890—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. BARLOW: A bill (H. R. 5358) providing for the erection of an addition to the public building at Los Angeles, Cal., and appropriating money therefor—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. LOUD: A bill (H. R. 5359) to amend the postal laws relating to second-class mail matter—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. TATE: A bill (H. R. 5360) to give jurisdiction to try and dispose of all cases punishable by fine and imprisonment for less than one year—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. CRANFORD: A bill (H. R. 5361) to make an appropriation for the improvement of Cypress Bayou and the lakes between Shreveport, La., and Jefferson, Tex., and for other purposes—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, December 18, 1897.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on motion of Mr. HAWLEY and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5173) authorizing the Secretary of War, in his discretion, to purchase subsistence stores, supplies, and materials for the relief of the people who are in the Yukon River country, to provide means for their transportation and distribution, and making an appropriation therefor; agreed to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CANNON, Mr. NORTHWAY, and Mr. SAYERS managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 4847) for the relief of Judson Jones; and

A joint resolution (H. Res. 105) extending limit of cost of the Government building or buildings at the Trans-Mississippi and International Exposition at Omaha, Nebr., and reducing cost of Government exhibit.

POSTAL SAVINGS BANKS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read:

To the Senate:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State relating to the nature and practical workings of the postal telegraph, telephones, and postal savings banks of foreign countries, with accompanying papers, requested by the resolution of the Senate of July 12, 1897.

WILLIAM MCKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, December 18, 1897.

The message was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed; and the accompanying papers were referred to the Committee on Printing.

CORRESPONDENCE RELATING TO FUR SEALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit herewith, in answer to the resolution of the Senate of May 25, 1897, a report from the Secretary of State, accompanied by copies of correspondence of record in the Department of State touching the protection of fur seals in Bering Sea and the North Pacific Ocean.

WILLIAM MCKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, December 18, 1897.

EMPLOYEES IN TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury (in response to a resolution of the 16th instant, calling on the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish certain information as to supernumerary employees of that Department, and also whether any employees have been retired from active service and are drawing pay or compensation from the Government), stating that there are no supernumerary employees in the Treasury Department or any of its several bureaus or branches, and that there are no persons in the service who have been retired from active service and are drawing pay or compensation from the Government except officers in the Revenue-Cutter Service, which was provided for by law under the act approved March 2, 1895; which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

HYDROGRAPHIC CHARTS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 13th instant, 100 copies each of two charts recently prepared in the Bureau of Hydrography, and lithographed, showing the sailing routes of steam vessels of heavy burden on the Atlantic and Pacific oceans and the locations of their coasts and the islands in those oceans; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PROPOSED AGREEMENTS WITH INDIAN TRIBES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with the provisions of the sixteenth section of the Indian appropriation act of March 3, 1893, an agreement between the commissioners of the United States to negotiate with the Five Civilized Tribes and the commission on the part of the Muskogee or Creek Nation, concluded on the 27th day of September, 1897. also the reports of the Indian Office thereon, together with further information that has been reported to the Department by Hon. Tams Bixby, acting chairman of the commission to the Five Civilized Tribes, in a telegraphic dispatch that the council of the Muskogee-Creek Nation has rejected the agreement; which, with the accompanying papers, was, on motion of Mr. BERRY, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REVENUE CUTTERS OFF THE FLORIDA COAST.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 16th instant, a statement showing what revenue cutters of the United States since March 4, 1897, have been maintained off the coast of Florida, or in waters contiguous, to thwart attempts to violate the neutrality laws; also what vessels have been captured while engaged in violation or alleged violation of neutrality laws; the names and details concerning such vessels so captured, etc.; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 4847) for the relief of Judson Jones was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

EXPOSITION IN 1898 AT OMAHA, NEBR.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 106) extending limit of cost of the Government building or buildings at the Trans-Mississippi and International Exposition at Omaha, Nebr., and reducing cost of Government exhibit was read the first time by its title.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask that the Senate concur with the House and put the joint resolution on its passage. It does not increase the cost to the Government, but simply diverts for the completion of the building a portion of the $150,000 that was assigned to make an exhibit. The plan of the building was a little too large for the appropriation, and the joint resolution simply transfers a portion of it.

Mr. ALLISON. Let the joint resolution be read at length.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be constructed and completed, at an additional cost not to exceed $10,000, the Government building at the Trans-Mississippi and International Exposition at Omaha, Nebr., as shown and called for by the plans, drawings, and specifications on which bids were taken for its erection, etc.; and that the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, further authorized and directed to cause to be erected at said exposition a building for an exhibit of the United States Life-Saving Service, at a cost not to exceed for said building the sum of $2,500; and to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to give effect to and execute the provisions of this act the limit of cost of the Government building or buildings authorized to be erected at said exposition is hereby extended from $50,000 to $62,500; and the cost of the Government exhibit at said exposition is hereby reduced from $150,000 to $137,500.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MITCHELL presented a petition of the Wisconsin Commandery of the Military Order of the Loyal Legion of the United States of America, praying for the enactment of legislation to establish a national military park to commemorate the campaign, siege, and defense of Vicksburg; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I present a memorial of the Columbia Historical Society of the District of Columbia, relative to the names of streets in the District. I move that the memorial be printed as a document and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. QUAY. I present a petition of a large number of men and women of the Seneca Nation of Indians, in New York, favoring legislation for the distribution of moneys received from leases of lands belonging to that tribe. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. QUAY. I present, in behalf of my colleague [Mr. PENROSE], who is necessarily absent, resolutions passed by the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, Pa., recognizing the wisdom of the action of the Government in planning for the increase of the heavy artillery branch of the service. I move that the resolutions be referred to the Committee on Coast Defenses.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. I present a series of resolutions adopted by the Kansas City Transportation Bureau, an organization representing the commercial and manufacturing interests of Kansas City, opposing a division of freights and railway pooling. I move that the resolutions be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Portland, Me., praying that an examination be made of the Portland Harbor, with a view to the establishment of a naval dry dock at that port; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. ALLEN presented the affidavits of Dr. A. E. Scofield, John Crook, R. E. Rouse, S. W. Deud, and Charles Evans, citizens of Nebraska, in support of Senate bill No. 78, to pension Hiram Damon; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present a petition of the Sunday School Convention of Kingsville, Mo., praying for the passage of a bill to protect State anticigarette laws by providing that cigarettes imported in original packages on entering any State shall become subject to its laws. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1212) for the relief of Paymaster James E. Tolfree, United States Navy, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1213) for the relief of Pay Clerk Charles Blake, United States Navy, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1316) to provide for organizing a naval battalion in the District of Columbia, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

REPORT OF EXPEDITION TO ALASKA.

Mr. LODGE. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the concurrent resolution submitted by the Senator from Washington [Mr. WILSON] on the 13th instant, to report it with an amendment, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution, which was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 5,000 copies of Senate Executive Document 125, second session, Forty-ninth Congress, entitled "Report of an expedition to the Copper, Tanana, and Koyukuk rivers, in the Territory of Alaska," 1,500 copies to be for the use of the Senate, 3,500 copies to be for the use of the House of Representatives.

The amendment of the Committee on Printing was to add at the end of the resolution "and 500 copies for distribution by the Secretary of the Interior."

Mr. COCKRELL. Now let the resolution be read as proposed to be amended.

The Secretary read the resolution and the amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. In other words, it is proposed to print 5,000 copies and distribute 5,500. I move to strike out "five hundred" after "three thousand," so as to give the House of Representatives 3,000 copies. Then we shall have the right number, I think.

Mr. LODGE. To make it uniform, of course, the amendment ought also to increase the number to 5,500.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 7 strike out the words "five hundred;" so as to read "3,000 copies to be for the use of the House of Representatives."

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us observe the rule we adopted years ago. Let the number be 3,000 for the House, 1,500 for the Senate, and 500 for the Secretary of the Interior. That makes 5,000 copies.

The amendment was agreed to.

The concurrent resolution as amended was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WELLINGTON introduced a bill (S. 2882) for the relief of James S. Crawford; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. McMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 2883) to secure uniformity in the names of the streets and roads in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2884) relating to the names of streets in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2890) for the relief of David B. Zorger and H. C. Fitzgerald; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

A bill (S. 2891) to correct the military record of Eugene Hudson (with an accompanying paper);

A bill (S. 2892) to correct the military record of David Sides;

A bill (S. 2893) to correct the military record of John P. Leitzel; and

A bill (S. 2894) to correct the military record of Henry Dimler.

Mr. WETMORE introduced a bill (S. 2895) for the relief of Jeremiah McCarthy and Bartholomew Shea, and for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Patrick J. Sullivan and John B. Dillon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. GEAR introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 2896) granting a pension to Daniel M. Shepherd (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 2897) granting a pension to Elvina F. Hayes (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 2898) granting a pension to R. A. Schellhous (with accompanying papers).

Mr. PERKINS introduced a bill (S. 2899) granting a pension to Benjamin F. Howland; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BAKER introduced a bill (S. 2900) to remove the bar of the statute of limitation and give the right of appeal in certain cases; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 2901) granting a pension to I. A. Weller, of Leavenworth, Kans. (with an accompanying paper);

A bill (S. 2902) granting an increase of pension to Andrew J. Arnett (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 2903) granting an increase of pension to William F. Cloud, of Kansas City, Mo. (with accompanying papers).

Mr. COCKRELL introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine:

A bill (S. 2904) for the investigation of leprosy;

A bill (S. 2905) for the investigation of pollution of water supplies; and

A bill (S. 2906) for the purchase of a site and the erection of building for the hygienic laboratory of the Marine-Hospital Service.

Mr. SMITH introduced a bill (S. 2907) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary E. Lacey (formerly Roby), late a hospital nurse in the United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CHILTON introduced a bill (S. 2908) granting a pension to G. H. Giddings; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WHITE introduced a bill (S. 2909) to amend section 3221 of the Revised Statutes, with reference to the abatement, in certain cases, of taxes on spirits; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2910) granting a pension to Samuel M. Doolittle; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PETTIGREW introduced a bill (S. 2911) to aid the public-land States to support schools of mines; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2912) granting an increase of pension to Sparhawk Hutchins; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DANIEL introduced a bill (S. 2913) to erect monuments in honor of Gen. Joseph Warren in the city of Boston, Mass., and in honor of Gen. Hugh Mercer in the city of Fredericksburg, Va., as provided for in the resolution of the Continental Congress of April 8, 1777; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2914) for the relief of the estate of Dennis O'Dea, deceased, late of Richmond, Va.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BURROWS introduced a bill (S. 2915) for the relief of the owner or owners of the schooner Bergen; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2916) relating to the Washington, Woodside and Forest Glen Railway and Power Company, of Montgomery County, Md.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BAKER introduced a bill (S. 2918) granting a pension to Frederick Weller; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HALE introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 76) providing for the restoration to the Navy of graduates of the Naval Academy discharged in pursuance of the act of August 5, 1882; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CHANDLER (for Mr. TILLMAN) introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 77) to authorize the President to appoint as an assistant engineer in the Navy ex-Naval Cadet T. D. Parker; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. LODGE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the legislative appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. QUAY. I submit an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, the amendment providing for secretary of legation at the Swiss mission and a consulate in the Island of Formosa. I move that the amendment be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

THE CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. CULLOM submitted the following resolutions; which were considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the heads of the several Executive Departments, respectively, be directed to inform the Senate what appointive positions, if any, in their respective Departments should, in their opinion, be excepted from the operation of the laws governing the civil service or the rules established by the Civil Service Commission.

Resolved, That the said heads of the several Executive Departments, respectively, be directed to inform the Senate what changes or amendments to the present civil-service rules seem to be desirable, as indicated by their experience.

STATUS OF FREEDMEN IN CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW NATIONS.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I desire to have a resolution passed calling for some information which it seems necessary to have before Congress shall assemble after the holiday recess.

The resolution was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, directed to report to the Senate, as early as practicable, the present status in the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, Indian Territory, of the freedmen—former slaves and their descendants—of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians; also his suggestions and recommendations, with those of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, as to the further legislation by Congress, if any, deemed necessary to properly adjust and establish their status in either of said nations, and to settle their just and equitable claims arising under and growing out of the stipulations of the treaty of 1866 by the United States with the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, and the failure heretofore of the fulfillment thereof.

RAILWAY AND STEAMSHIP MAIL CONTRACTS.

Mr. ALLEN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate of all railway and steamship mail contracts made with the United States and now in force, the name of the persons or companies with whom made, the services to be performed, and the sum to be paid by the United States therefor.

HARRY K. SPRING AND CHARLES W. NELSON.

Mr. WHITE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if not, in his opinion, incompatible with the public interests, to inform the Senate what action, if any, has been taken looking to the release of Harry K. Spring and Charles W. Nelson, citizens of the United States and residents of the State of California, who are now under arrest in the Republic of Colombia, and also to transmit to the Senate the correspondence, if any, in said matter.

HYDROGRAPHIC CHARTS.

On motion of Mr. MORGAN, it was Ordered, That one copy each of Hydrographic Charts Nos. 1262 and 1682, sent in by the Secretary of the Navy, be distributed to Senators by the superintendent of the document room.

MESSAGES RELATING TO HAWAIIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask for the adoption of the following order:

Ordered, That there be printed, under one cover, for the use of the Senate, the messages of the Presidents relating to Hawaiian affairs, which are set forth in Appendix II to House Executive Document No. 1, part 1, Fifty-third Congress, third session, from page 1151 to page 1297 of said document, both inclusive.

Mr. HALE. Should not that go to the Committee on Printing?

Mr. MORGAN. No; it is not necessary that it should go to the Committee on Printing. It is a reprint of a matter that has heretofore been printed, but in such a cumbrous form and so disconnected that it would be very inconvenient for Senators to use it. It contains the messages of President Cleveland in reference to Hawaii.

Mr. HALE. Is it a little matter that will not cost $500? All orders to print where the cost exceeds $500 ought of course to go to the committee.

Mr. MORGAN. It will not cost $500.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and the question is on the adoption of the order.

The order was agreed to.

STEREOTYPE OF RAMIE DOCUMENTS.

Mr. CHANDLER submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That the Public Printer be authorized to allow Mr. S. H. Slaught to have the stereotype of his ramie documents, Nos. 47 and 57, Fifty-fourth Congress, second session, and the articles published on the ramie industry by the Government in the September (1897) number of the American Republics Bulletin, to be used in his work for the promotion of the ramie industry.

BERNARD CAMPBELL.

Mr. KYLE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State is directed to transmit to the Senate at an early day all papers and correspondence with the Haitian Government relating to the claim of Bernard Campbell.

CAPT. ISAAC D. TOLL AND HENRY WILSON.

Mr. BURROWS. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the votes by which the Senate passed the bill (S. 959) to increase the pension of Capt. Isaac D. Toll and the bill (S. 1453) granting an increase of pension to Henry Wilson.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

BENJAMIN L. NOLAN.

Mr. LODGE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2807) granting a pension to Benjamin L. Nolan.

Mr. HALE. I will not object to this bill, as the Senator from Massachusetts says it will take no time, but there is a large number of nominations that have come in from the President which ought to be referred to-day, and some cases that probably ought to be acted upon. With the knowledge of a speedy adjournment Senators are leaving the Chamber, and I am afraid we shall find ourselves without a quorum if we do not transact the executive business at once. But I shall not object to this bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish to make a suggestion relative to the Senator's remark regarding an early adjournment. I am hoping every moment to hear that the House has adopted the report of the conference committee on the Klondike measure, and I trust the Senate may not adjourn leaving that half finished.

Mr. HALE. We can settle that at any time after we go into executive session.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill indicated by the Senator from Massachusetts?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place upon the pension roll the name of Benjamin L. Nolan, late a private in Company D, Eighth Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, and Troop G, Third United States Cavalry, and to pay him a pension of $12 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5173) authorizing the Secretary of War, in his discretion, to purchase subsistence stores, supplies, and materials for the relief of people who are in the Yukon River country, to provide means for their transportation and distribution, and making an appropriation therefor.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 4769) to amend an act granting to the Gila Valley, Globe and Northern Railway Company a right of way through the San Carlos Indian Reservation, in Arizona; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 2612) prohibiting the killing of fur seals in the waters of the North Pacific Ocean; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

RELIEF OF SUFFERERS IN THE VALLEY OF THE YUKON.

Mr. HAWLEY. I present the report of the committee of conference of the two Houses upon House bill 5173, which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair). The Secretary will read the report of the conference committee.

The Secretary read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5173) authorizing the Secretary of War, in his discretion, to purchase subsistence stores, supplies, and materials for the relief of people who are in the Yukon River country, to provide means for their transportation and distribution, and making an appropriation therefor, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter inserted by said Senate amendment insert the following:

"That the sum of $200,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended, or so much thereof as may be necessary, in the discretion and under the direction of the Secretary of War, for the purchase of subsistence stores, supplies, and materials for the relief of people who are in the Yukon River country or other mining regions of Alaska, and to purchase transportation and provide means for the distribution of such stores and supplies: Provided, That with the consent of the Canadian Government first obtained, the Secretary of War may cause the relief herein provided for to be extended into Canadian territory. That the said subsistence stores, supplies, and materials may be sold in said country at such prices as shall be fixed by the Secretary of War, or donated where he finds people in need and unable to pay for the same. That the Secretary of War is authorized to use the Army of the United States in carrying into effect the provisions of this act, and may, in his discretion, purchase and import reindeer and employ and bring into the country reindeer drivers or herders not citizens of the United States, or provide such other means of transportation as he may deem practicable. The said reindeer or other outfit may be sold and disposed of by the Secretary of War when he shall have no further use for them under the provisions of this act, or he may turn over the same or any part thereof to the Department of the Interior, and the proceeds arising from all sales herein authorized shall be covered into the Treasury.

"SEC. 2. The Secretary of War shall make report in detail to Congress at the beginning of its next regular session as to all purchases, employments, sales, and donations or transfers made under the provisions of this act."

And the Senate agree to the same.

JOS. R. HAWLEY,
THOS. H. CARTER,
F. M. COCKRELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

J. G. CANNON,
S. A. NORTHWAY,
JOSEPH D. SAYERS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HAWLEY. I desire to say something in regard to the report. The report as agreed to by the conferees is substantially the same as the bill passed by the Senate, with one exception, and that is, we could not get the conferees of the House of Representatives to agree to the provision inserted by the Senate, "and such other supplies as may be contributed by the citizens of Oregon and others." The people of Oregon have accumulated 100 tons of what they consider suitable supplies, and offer to give them if the Government will take them and carry them up to the points where needed; but the conferees on the part of the House objected strenuously to anything in the nature of that kind of charity. We saw no objection in the world to it, because the Secretary of War could take all of such provisions, or such portion of them as would be most suitable and most easily transported, and could have taken his choice. It would have been, in our judgment, something of a saving. I see no impropriety in accepting gifts of that kind, for certainly, if the citizens of Oregon are really anxious to have those provisions distributed to the sufferers, and the Secretary of War goes into the market to purchase provisions on competitive bids, they can offer to sell him all theirs for a cent a pound. But rather than have any further dispute about the matter, as the substantial usefulness of the bill is retained, I move the adoption of the conference report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the report of the conference committee.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to antagonize the conference report, but it does seem to me that something ought to be said to indicate that it is not the purpose of the Government of the United States to make this a chronic contribution. It is a very grave question as to how far the Government ought to go in relieving distress of this kind. Such action has heretofore been in a large measure, if not exclusively, confined to cases where there has been public calamity of some kind growing out of floods or famine or something of kindred character. This is not of that character. True, it may be termed to be an emergency growing out of the rush of a great number of people to an unknown country without proper anticipation of the hardships to which they would be subjected, and in that view this may possibly be of a kindred character to those cases where suffering is caused by some providential calamity. But the same condition of affairs which exists to-day in that region is one that may exist twelve months from to-day, and probably in greater degree, and while it is not my purpose to antagonize the present appropriation in any way, I desire that it be put upon record that there will be some at least who will not recognize the propriety of a repetition of this charity for those who voluntarily may subject themselves to such hardships and dangers.

Mr. HAWLEY. The application of the Senator's remarks, or a portion of them, would be something like this: He would wait until those people had starved before he would send them food. We should prevent such a calamity.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Connecticut certainly did not understand my remarks.

Mr. HAWLEY. I mean that would be the effect of them.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I am not antagonizing the present appropriation, but desire, in connection with the making of that appropriation, that it should be put on record that there will not be unanimous consent hereafter to a repetition of this charity, because the parties are now on notice. They may heretofore not have known that they would be subjected to these dangers, and it may be in consequence proper that we should go to their relief; but this is not to be the case in the future, because hereafter those who go to that country will know the fact that they are going to a climate where they will be exposed to death from the inclemency of the weather unless they have proper clothing and where they will be in danger of starvation for the want of proper food. Therefore they must not go there hereafter with the expectation that the United States Government is to be a perpetual almoner for the purpose of relieving the distresses of those who voluntarily place themselves in such a position. What I say does not apply to the present condition of those who are now sought to be benefited.

Mr. HAWLEY. It would be quite useless, I should say, for the United States Senate to give informal notice to American citizens that they should not be in a certain place at a certain time. They are going up there if the development of gold continues, and, obviously, we may expect that before the return of another season the enterprise of those who are so deeply interested under these extraordinary temptations will lead to a better means of communication, and that no such emergency will again arise.

Mr. BACON. We can not be altogether sure of that.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I think a word might be said in regard to this appropriation. Last summer, when the great rush to the Klondike occurred, everybody was warned by the newspapers in my section relative to the taking in of supplies, and every effort was made to get supplies into that country by the two great transportation companies; but owing to an unforeseen thing, namely, the drought in that country, the Yukon River was lower last year than ever before known by anyone who had been in that region.

Food supplies are now scattered all along the river from 50 miles from its mouth to 200 miles, 400 miles, 800 miles, and 1,400 miles. When they reached that distance they were unable to get any farther owing to low water. The transportation companies and the people interested in sending supplies into that country have made every effort to get supplies there. There are thousands and thousands of tons of food supplies along the Yukon River now. There are probably 10,000 tons at Skaguay; but it has been impossible to get them into that country owing to the peculiar climatic conditions and the lateness of the season. I think the Senator will not find that the same conditions will prevail next year. Food will be gotten in there in abundance; and I do not think any appropriation will ever be called for again. That is my judgment.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not wish to be misunderstood with reference to this matter. I have endeavored as plainly as I could to disclaim any opposition to the present appropriation, but I did think that, if there was nothing said upon the subject and this appropriation were made, vast numbers of people might in the coming season go there with the anticipation that it was not necessary that they should make provision for their sustenance, but that the United States Government stood ready to take care of them if they also should fall in need as the people now there are in need. While the next season may present a condition of affairs where it may be proper for us to make an appropriation, I think it is well for the public to be upon notice that it is not recognized by the United States Government as something to be done by them unless the peculiar circumstances of the case will warrant it. That was the sole purpose I had in making any statement in reference to the matter.

Mr. WILSON. I will say to the Senator that I think it ought to be known that now, at Old Fort Yukon, within 450 miles of Dawson City, there are probably 2,000 tons of food which has reached that point, but which it is impossible to get over the shoals of the river Yukon. So that everything possible thus far has been done. The people who went in there did not carry a year's supply of provisions, thinking such supplies would come up the river. They have been disappointed owing to the inability of the transportation companies, on account of low water, to get there. That has produced peculiar conditions in that section this year which I suppose will not occur at another time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the report of the conference committee.

The report was concurred in.

GILA VALLEY, GLOBE AND NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. STEWART. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the bill from the House of Representatives granting a right of way through the San Carlos Indian Reservation, in Arizona, with a view to its present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the bill indicated, which will be read at length.

The bill (H. R. 4769) to amend an act granting to the Gila Valley, Globe and Northern Railway Company a right of way through the San Carlos Indian Reservation, in Arizona, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5 of the act entitled "An act granting to the Gila Valley, Globe and Northern Railway Company a right of way through the San Carlos Indian Reservation, in the Territory of Arizona," approved February 18, 1895, be, and the same is hereby, amended so that said section shall read as follows:

"SEC. 5. That the right herein granted shall be forfeited by said company unless the road be constructed through the said reservation within two years after the passage of this act."

Mr. STEWART. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORT OF JOINT SELECT COMMITTEE ON ALCOHOL IN THE ARTS.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I desire to ask for an order to print 1,000 extra copies of the report proper of the Joint Select Committee on Alcohol, which was presented yesterday, not to include the testimony, but merely the report, with the views of the separate members of the committee. It will be a very small expense, as the whole matter is stereotyped. The report, when it comes in, will be connected with a mass of testimony, and I desire to have 1,000 extra copies of the report itself printed.

There being no objection, the order was agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That 1,000 additional copies of Report 411 of the Joint Select Committee on the Use of Alcohol in Manufactures and the Arts, including the views of individual members, be printed without the testimony for the use of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H. R. 5173) authorizing the Secretary of War, in his discretion, to purchase subsistence stores, supplies, and materials for the relief of people who are in the Yukon River country, to provide means for their transportation and distribution, and making an appropriation therefor; and

A joint resolution (H. Res. 106) extending the limit of cost of the Government building or buildings at the Trans-Mississippi and International Exposition at Omaha, Nebr., and reducing cost of Government exhibit.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of executive business. After fifty-seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 1 o'clock and 57 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned, the adjournment being, under the concurrent resolution of the two Houses, until Wednesday, January 5, 1898, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate December 18, 1897.

ASSISTANT SOLICITOR OF THE TREASURY.

Felix A. Reeve, of Tennessee, to be Assistant Solicitor of the Treasury, vice Norborne T. N. Robinson, resigned.

Felix A. Reeve was temporarily appointed to the above-named position on August 5, 1897, during recess of the Senate.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, December 18, 1897.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

The Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, offered the following prayer:

O Lord, our God and Father, in whose encircling love we dwell, how inadequate is language to express our gratitude, how poor our opportunities to return to Thee those things which we ought to give for all the blessings Thou hast bestowed upon us.

Teach us how to use the faculties of our minds and the powers of our souls that we may best fit ourselves for this life and that higher life to come; how we may best spread abroad Thy kingdom upon the earth, that all men may join in the angel chorus, Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will to men.

We bless Thee for that life in Jesus Christ which is the great example for us all. Help us to follow in His wake, and accept our thanks for all the great and noble lives who have tried to follow in His footsteps. For—

> Lives of great men all remind us
> We can make our lives sublime,
> And, departing, leave behind us
> Footprints on the sands of time.

As our thoughts go out to-day to one of our members who has passed into that glorious life beyond the grave, may we call to mind all that was pure and noble and best in his character, and may we strive to emulate his virtues.

Bless those whose heartstrings were torn asunder by his sudden death, and all those who knew him and loved him on this floor. And help us to remember that the earth is not man's only abiding place, but that there is a realm above, where the rainbow never fades, where the stars are spread out before us as islands that slumber on the ocean, and where the beautiful forms that here pass before us, like the visions of a dream, will stay in our presence forever.

Hear us and bless us, in the name of Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

RELIEF FOR SUFFERING MINERS, YUKON RIVER COUNTRY.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to submit a conference report.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

Mr. CANNON. This is a report on the bill (H. R. 5173) authorizing the Secretary of War to purchase stores and supplies for the relief of starving people in the Yukon River country. I ask that the formal reading of the conference report be dispensed with and that the report of the House committee, which fully explains the matter, be read in its place.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Is there a written statement of the House conferees?

Mr. CANNON. There is.

The SPEAKER. The statement of the House conferees will be read, in the absence of objection, instead of the conference report.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

The managers on the part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 5173) authorizing the Secretary of War to purchase subsistence stores, supplies, and materials for the relief of people who are in the Yukon River country, and making appropriation therefor, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

The sum of $200,000 is recommended, in lieu of $175,000, as proposed by the House, and $250,000, as proposed by the Senate.

It is provided that the consent of the Canadian Government be first obtained, in order that the relief contemplated may be extended into Canadian territory; and the Secretary of War is authorized to use the Army of the United States in carrying into effect the provisions of the act.

Otherwise the bill is substantially as passed by the House.

J. G. CANNON,
JOSEPH D. SAYERS,
Managers on the part of the House.

The conference report was agreed to.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the bill (S. 141) granting an increase of pension to Capt. John W. Dodd, which was heretofore referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, will be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. HULL to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of W. T. Dodge, Fifty-fourth Congress, there being no adverse report.

GILA VALLEY AND NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution to amend a bill which was passed on yesterday under a misapprehension. I refer to the bill (H. R. 4769) to amend an act granting to the Gila Valley, Globe and Northern Railway Company a right of way through the San Carlos Indian Reservation, in Arizona.

I was not in the House at the time the bill was passed, which supposedly extended the time for the construction of the line for two years. The wording of the bill was such, however, that rather than extend the time for two years it contracted the time; and I now ask unanimous consent that a change in the wording of the bill shall be made, so that it will conform to the intention of the House on yesterday, when it was passed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4769) to amend an act granting to the Gila Valley, Globe and Northern Railway Company a right of way through the San Carlos Indian Reservation, in Arizona.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the proposed amendment which the gentleman from New York suggests in order to correct the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in section 5, the words "within two years after the passage of this act" and insert "on or before February 18, 1900."

Mr. SHERMAN. Of course, that section taking its place in the original bill, the original bill having given three years within which the construction could be made, this cuts that three years down to two. The intention of the present bill was to extend the time two years. I ask now that that section be amended to the form in which the Clerk has it upon the printed bill, which will conform to the intent.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the proposed change.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 5 by striking out, in line 11, after the word "reservation," the words "within two years after the passage of this act" and insert in lieu thereof the words "on or before February 18, 1900."

The SPEAKER. The question before the House is, Is there unanimous consent to vacate the passage of the bill, and the order for its engrossment and third reading, and to reconsider?

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Speaker, that bill was introduced by the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], and he is not present at this moment. I think it is a courtesy to him that he should be present. He will be here in a moment. I have sent for him.

Mr. SHERMAN. The gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] desires to have this done. I am asking it for him.

Mr. BERRY. I did not know that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on reconsidering the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is upon agreeing to the amendment, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] proposes as an amendment to the amendment that which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 11, after the word "reservation," strike out the words "within two years after the passage of this act" and insert in lieu thereof "on or before February 18, 1900;" so that it will read:

"That the right herein granted shall be forfeited by such company unless the road be constructed through the said reservation on or before February 18, 1900."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CERTAIN CASH ENTRIES OF PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. BAIRD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4221) to confirm certain cash entries of public lands.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana desires unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which the Clerk will report to the House.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all entries of the public lands made under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to graduate and reduce the price of the public lands to actual settlers and cultivators," approved August 4, 1854, which are illegal and invalid because of the failure of the registers and receivers to previously collect from the settler the full price of the lands covered thereby, be, and the same are hereby, confirmed, if, upon examination by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, the same are found to be otherwise regular and in compliance with said act and the acts supplemental thereto.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BAIRD, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE CHANGES.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to announce the following changes in committees:

The gentleman from Indiana, Mr. JOHNSON, desires to be excused from serving as chairman of the Committee on Elections No. 2; the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. CODDING, from the Committee on Elections No. 3; the gentleman from New York, Mr. MCCLELLAN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions; the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. KIRKPATRICK, from service on the Committee on Pacific Railroads. If there be no objection, the Chair will understand that the House consents to these gentlemen being excused from service on these committees. The Chair hears no objection. The Chair will appoint the gentleman from New York, Mr. DRIGGS, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions; the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. LAWRENCE, to the Committee on Elections No. 1 and to the Committee on Mileage; the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. ROYSE, to be chairman of the Committee on Elections No. 2; the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. GRIFFITH, to the Committee on the Public Lands; the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. BOUTELL, to the Committee on Elections No. 3; the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. CODDING, to the Committee on Pacific Railroads. The Chair would announce that he is unable to appoint the gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. NORTON, to any committee, because it requires the consent of a gentleman whom the Chair has been unable to consult.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its secretaries, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5173) authorizing the Secretary of War, in his discretion, to purchase subsistence stores, supplies, and materials for the relief of the people who are in the Yukon River country, to provide means for their transportation and distribution, and making an appropriation therefor.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution (H. Res. 106) extending limit of cost of the Government building or buildings at the Trans-Mississippi and International Exposition at Omaha, Nebr., and reducing cost of Government exhibit.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following concurrent resolution:

Resolved, etc., That there be printed 5,000 copies of Senate Executive Document 125, second session Forty-ninth Congress, entitled "Report of an expedition to the Copper, Tanana, and Koyukuk rivers, in the Territory of Alaska," 1,500 copies to be for the use of the Senate, 3,000 to be for the use of the House of Representatives, and 500 copies for distribution by the Secretary of the Interior.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 4769) to amend the act granting to the Gila Valley, Globe and Northern Railway Company a right of way through San Carlos Indian Reservation in Arizona.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. WILLIAM S. HOLMAN, late a Representative from the State of Indiana.

Resolved, That the business of the Senate be now suspended in order that fitting tribute may be paid to his memory.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted by the Secretary of the Senate to the family of the deceased; and that as a further mark of respect the Senate will, at the conclusion of these ceremonies, stand adjourned.

RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, the following resolution was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

Concurrent resolution—

Resolved, etc., That there be printed 5,000 copies of Senate Executive Document 125, second session Forty-ninth Congress, entitled "Report of an expedition to the Copper, Tanana, and Koyukuk rivers in the Territory of Alaska," 1,500 copies to be for the use of the Senate, 3,000 copies to be for the use of the House of Representatives, and 500 copies for distribution by the Secretary of the Interior—

To the Committee on Printing.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled joint resolution and bills of the following titles:

H. Res. 106. Joint resolution extending limit of cost of the Government building or buildings at the Trans-Mississippi and International Exposition at Omaha, Nebr., and reducing cost of Government exhibit.

H. R. 5173. An act authorizing the Secretary of War, in his discretion, to purchase subsistence stores, supplies, and materials for the relief of the people who are in the Yukon River country, to provide means for their transportation and distribution, and making an appropriation therefor.

S. 2612. An act prohibiting the killing of fur seals in the waters of the North Pacific Ocean.

DEATH OF HON. EDWARD D. COOKE.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. EDWARD DEAN COOKE, late a Representative from the State of Illinois.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased and in recognition of his eminent abilities as a distinguished public servant the House, at the conclusion of these memorial proceedings, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk be instructed to communicate a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, on this solemn occasion—an occasion of deep and especial solemnity to me—it would have been my preference to have listened in silence to the testimony of his colleagues to the high character and useful life of the late Representative from the Sixth district of Illinois.

But a strong sense of loyalty to his memory, and a knowledge of the affectionate regard with which he is remembered by those whom he represented, as well as deference to the venerable customs of this honorable body, constrain me to break the silence which other feelings equally strong and deep would have imposed upon me.

My acquaintance with Mr. COOKE which afterwards ripened into friendship and esteem, began when he was about to enter public life, and since then there has been a singular sequence in the events of our lives. Fifteen years ago he was elected a member of the general assembly of the State of Illinois from what was then the Sixth senatorial district, a district which was almost identical with the present Sixth Congressional district. When his term in the State legislature expired thirteen years ago he declined to be a candidate for reelection; and, largely through the influence of Mr. COOKE and his friends, I was nominated and elected as his successor. In 1894 and again in 1896 he was elected a member of this House, and when, a few months ago, he was called to a higher assembly and it became necessary to elect his successor the choice again fell upon me.

And so it has come to pass, as part of this strange series of coincidences, that the first words that I am called upon to utter in this Chamber are a tribute of affectionate regard to him who was doubly my friend and predecessor. But what place could be more fitting in which to pay such a tribute than this Hall—the scene of his best labors, where his genial presence was so familiar and where we would all rejoice to see him again to-day? To me the cloud that overshadowed the contest for the choice of his successor was the thought that it was to fill the place of one whose life had been so full of useful labors for the people, so rich in promise of a still more useful future.

EDWARD DEAN COOKE was born at Cascade, Dubuque County, Iowa, on the 17th day of October, 1849. He received his preliminary education at the public schools and academy of his native town and at the Dubuque High School. After spending some time in the study of law at Dubuque he entered the law department of the Columbian University at Washington, where he received the degree of bachelor of law in 1873. The same year he moved to Chicago and was admitted to the bar. From this time he lived and practiced his profession continuously in Chicago till the time of death, during the last twenty years as partner with Maj. Henry D. Beam, for many years one of the leading lawyers of the Illinois bar.

While a member of the State legislature in 1883 Mr. COOKE served on the judiciary committee, the committee on banking and currency, and was chairman of the committee on elections. Here he laid the foundations of his accurate knowledge of parliamentary law and acquired that skill and experience in dealing with contested-election cases that made his services of such great value in this House.

He was first elected to Congress in 1894, receiving 17,062 votes against 15,433 for his Democratic opponent and 4,159 for the Populist candidate. In 1896 he was reelected by a vote of 25,723 against a vote of 19,144 for his opponent. He died suddenly, in Washington, on the 25th of last June, during the special session of this Congress.

Success in life is not to be measured by the multitude of things accomplished, nor by the splendor and applause with which they are achieved, but by the manner in which the life is lived. Judged by this standard, Mr. COOKE's life, short as it was, must be regarded as a successful life. He had a friend in everyone who knew him, and he was widely known, not only in his own district, but throughout the city which he represented. Those who knew him best loved him best. He lived a quiet, unostentatious life, governed in all its relations and activities by a high sense of duty. As a lawyer, he was accurate and painstaking; as a legislator, he was broad minded and conscientious; as a citizen, he was public spirited and patriotic; as a friend, he was sincere, loyal, and true.

Although an ardent Republican, there was no spark of partisan bitterness in his nature, and many of his most intimate personal friends were among his political adversaries. During an acquaintance of many years I never heard him speak a harsh word or utter an unjust sentiment against any man. Even in the heat of a political discussion or a partisan debate, his was always the answer that turneth away wrath.

It was my privilege during the recent contest to visit many industrial establishments located in my district, employing variously from 10 to 4,000 men, and it was a great pleasure to me to note the high esteem in which Mr. COOKE's memory was held, not only by those who knew him personally, but by those who knew him only as the Representative of this House and the advocate of the principles maintained by this honorable body.

In Mr. COOKE's own ward, and within a few squares of his former home, stands Saint-Gaudens's noble statue of Abraham Lincoln, at the main entrance to the beautiful park that bears his name. This statue is familiar to many of you. To me it is the most impressive work of art that I have ever seen. Mr. Lincoln is represented in a standing posture, with his head bent forward, his face haggard with thought. It seems as if he would soon raise his face and speak words of wisdom and counsel to a listening nation.

This statue seems to me a sublime embodiment of the loftiest conception of the solemnity of life and the duties and responsibilities of citizenship. I have often met Mr. COOKE in the vicinity of this statue and talked with him there of the life and character of Lincoln. It seems as if that mute, unyielding bronze, in some mysterious way, gave to those who were willing to accept it some measure of participation in the lofty traits which it represents. And if I were to try to mention the strongest characteristic of Mr. COOKE's life, I should say that he had learned one of the lessons of that statue—the dignity attaching to the conscientious performance of the common duties of daily life.

And now he has gone from us; but let us not say that we have lost him, or that the influence of his life has ceased.

In last Monday's issue of a German newspaper that comes to me daily from Chicago, appeared an account of the last hours of the mother of our Chief Magistrate. The heading of the article was "Der Heimgang der Mutter des Präsidenten"—the home-going of the President's mother. What a beautiful and tender expression of our fondest hopes and our highest faith! What a comforting conception of the passing of a noble life! The President's mother had become the type of all that is strong and pure and noble in American womanhood.

To her the Almighty had granted length of days that she might reap the fruit of years of self-sacrifice and devotion, that she might have the joy of beholding the highest earthly honors bestowed upon the object of her affections. Her years had been prolonged beyond the allotted span of human life and her cup of felicity had been filled to the brim. And when, in the calm, serene twilight of her life, the long-expected summons came for her home-going, it fell gently upon waiting ears, as she lay surrounded by all that she held dearest upon earth, while around her couch a nation watched in tender solicitude.

It was the same summons, and none other, that came to your colleague, my friend and predecessor, though it came to him unexpected, while he was at the post of duty, in the prime of mature manhood, alone and unattended.

The change that came to them that comes to all who lay aside the cares and burdens and renounce the joys of life, is not death, destruction, and loss; it is simply going home.

Alas for him who never sees
The stars shine through his cypress trees;
Who, hopeless, lays his dead away,
Nor looks to see the breaking day
Across the mournful marbles play;
Who has not learned in hours of faith
That truth to flesh and sense unknown,
That life is ever lord of death,
And love can never lose its own.

Those whom we love are never lost, and the influence of a good life never dies. Those whom we see no more in their accustomed places have been summoned home to become, in a higher, fuller, larger sense than was possible amid these earthly surroundings, the stewards and ministers of the mysteries of Divine Providence in the conduct of the affairs of men.

Our departed friend has left us the example of a well-spent life and a good name, which is rather to be chosen than great riches.

From his life we learn the value of the quiet performance of life's simple duties, and from the manner of his death we learn the importance of discharging day by day our obligations to our fellow-men, so that at each day's close we may say, as he might have said:

Before me loom the dark untrodden hills,
Which in the night, led by an unseen hand,
I soon must pass. Although what joys or ills
May lie beyond I do not understand,
The faith of all my years is with me still:
Calm and content, I wait the last command.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, it is fitting and appropriate that this House should pause in its deliberations upon the important questions of the hour and pay tribute to the memory of one who a short time ago was a member of this body, but was suddenly taken from it by the decree of an all-wise Providence, whose ways we must believe are for our own good.

In the ripeness of manhood, in the full strength of intellectual vigor, at the summit of a useful career, in love with all the world, EDWARD DEAN COOKE, on the morning of June 24 last, passed from the land that he loved to "the undiscover'd country from whose bourn no traveler returns."

I knew him well, and knowing him so well, I would not indulge in fulsome eulogy upon this occasion. He was a plain man who liked plain things. There was no superficiality about him. He was substantial. Manner and form did not attract him. His injunction to-day would be, Speak if thou wilt as thy heart speaketh.

Mr. COOKE was what we commonly term a self-made man. His life "in low estate began, and on a simple village green." He worked his way through school and college, and by his own unaided efforts and perseverance forced himself to the front in his profession and into public position. While ambitious in a marked degree, he was never envious of the success of others.

He entered the Fifty-fourth Congress as a Representative of the Sixth Illinois district, and served during that term, and in 1896 he was reelected by three times as large a majority as was his plurality in 1894. He served until the day of his death, June 24, 1897. In such a large body as this it is not usual that a new member can in the short period of a little more than one term leave much of an impress behind him. The most that such an one can do is to familiarize himself with the rules and proceedings of this body and prepare himself for future usefulness. But our lamented colleague, by reason of his past experience and natural aptitude, readily seized upon the work before him and took part occasionally in the debates.

He was a member of the Committees on Elections, Banking and Currency, and Patents. His most important labors were performed in the hotly contested election case of Rinaker vs. Downing. He was the chief spokesman for the contestant, and delivered an able argument upon that side of the case.

In the performance of all his Congressional duties, wherever they might lead him—to the Departments, into the committee room, or in this Hall—EDWARD DEAN COOKE was faithful to every trust.

He had many traits of character which endeared him to all who knew him well. He was frank and outspoken. There was no guile in his heart. He was honest in his actions. He was pure in his life. He was tender, sympathetic, and obliging; slow, perhaps, to make friends, but his unselfishness bound those he made to him with hooks of steel. "So long as I have been here," said President Lincoln after his second election, "I have not willingly planted a thorn in any man's bosom." One of the Senators from Illinois said this of COOKE upon hearing of his death: "His chief virtue was in this—he never carelessly or willingly wounded the feelings of a human being."

He was always hopeful and courageous. When his associates in any undertaking had lost heart and were in despair, COOKE was just buckling on his armor and entering the field full of faith and confident of victory. He was always at his best when sorest pressed. Then he displayed the true metal of which he was made. Reserved in manner, but reserved in power.

He was a modest man. There was no pretense about him. There was no assumption on his part. If others led, he was willing to follow, but they could only lead him where his conscience approved. Slow, perhaps, to make up his mind, but when decided he was quick to act. Convinced of his position, then let them assail him who would. He stood there to do battle for truth as he saw it. He wanted no other panoply than the approval of his own conscience.

He was a master of details. There was nothing so small but what his keen eye perceived it. He loved to delve and grope. His was an analytical mind, but, at the same time, he had a breadth of vision which saw facts in their true relation to principles. In his profession he might be called a case lawyer; in his public life an accurate, careful, and painstaking legislator.

He was methodical. Everything had its proper place. He lost no time in finding what he wanted. A student, he was well informed on all important subjects. Ready to speak, ready to act, and, ah, yes, ready to die. A few weeks before his death, while lunching with some of his friends in the Senate restaurant and discussing the subject of death, he said:

I am prepared for death, and have no fear of it. If I knew this minute that I was soon to die, it would not quicken or check my pulse in the slightest degree. Death has no horrors for me. We must all die some time and should have our affairs so arranged that we can go at any moment. We never know when the summons will come, and should be ever ready.

If this man with all his splendid abilities had lived, ever ready as he was for what was before him, it is not too much to say that in time he would have won a commanding position for himself in this House. But the silent angel of death beckoned him away, and to-day an aged mother mourns a loving son; innumerable friends, a genial associate; a large constituency, a faithful and incorruptable representative; a great city, one of her most loyal citizens; this House, an industrious and conscientious member, and the nation, an honest public servant.

To one who was summoned to his room a few hours before he died, and ministered to his wants, he, mistaking the relief of the moment for a sign of permanent cure, said—and these were his last words—"I will be better in a little while."

Let us hope that those last words were only prophetic of that peace and happiness which is his now to enjoy and will be his through all eternity.

I like the man who faces what he must
With step triumphant and a heart of cheer;
Who fights the daily battle without fear;
Sees his hopes fail, yet keeps unfaltering trust
That God is God; that, somehow, true and just,
His plans work out for mortals; not a tear
Is shed when fortune, which the world holds dear,
Falls from his grasp. Better, with love, a crust,
Than living in dishonor; envies not
Nor loses faith in man; but does his best,
Nor even murmurs at his humbler lot;
But with a smile and words of hope, gives zest
To every toiler. He alone is great
Who, by a life heroic, conquers fate.

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Speaker, my acquaintance with EDWARD D. COOKE began upon his entering this body at the beginning of the Fifty-fourth Congress. I have not sought to inform myself particularly with reference to the details of his earlier life, but rather choose to speak from my heart the impressions which have come to me from contact with the man and association with his friends.

We have just been told that he was a self-made man; that he belonged to that class of men in this great country who throughout its history have proven themselves to be the most useful—the men who have made themselves. He did not begin life under those favorable auspices which come to the rich. He was born in humble circumstances, and his education was acquired in the schools and the academies of the time. He came into this body flushed with the full vigor of manhood, apparently in the very blossom of health, and entered with avidity upon legislative duties.

I was associated with him on an important committee of the House, and there colabored with him and had an opportunity to observe his characteristics. He impressed me favorably from the beginning. There was a warm glint in the eye, full of sympathy, and a cordial clasp of the hand, which told me at once, "This man has a kindly heart, full of humanity and of gentleness;" and the longer I knew him the more I became convinced that my first impressions were correct.

He was, I have said, in the flush of manhood; and when one morning I came to the House and was told that EDWARD COOKE was dead, the blood chilled in my veins, and I felt a sickening horror, and said to myself, "Can this be? EDWARD COOKE dead! Who of us may not be the next?" When the shoulders are bowed down with the burden of accumulated years and wintry hairs have drifted themselves over the temples of old age, men live in expectancy of death—the old man sits by his hearthstone and awaits the coming of the grim messenger; but when one is snatched away while the cup of young life, sweet and full and warm, is at his very lips, it causes us to pale and shiver and grow cold and think that the dark hour that must come to each of us at some time may come at any time; for surely, Mr. Speaker, "Man cometh forth as a flower and is cut down."

EDWARD COOKE was an earnest, honest, faithful man; sincere, frank, and direct in all his methods, and if at times I was possessed of a fancy that he may have been too much impelled by partisan zeal, mayhap it was I who was partisan; for is there any man in this great body who is never overpersuaded by partisan zeal, whose judgment is never impaired by partisan feeling? It is a fact, however, that he gave evidence of fair and just manhood at all times, and was earnest and direct in his methods of work.

I was wont to believe, and I may be wrong in that, since we have been told differently by those who have preceded, that Mr. COOKE was an impulsive man. It struck me so, sir.

A man of warm impulses, yet at all times dignified and reserved, he seemed to respond to the demands of every situation promptly and vigorously. When aroused he was sharp and aggressive in conflict; yet, the conflict being over, there remained no traces of resentment; the clouds and dust of contest were soon dispelled by his warm and sunny disposition, and his heart and hand were ready for his recent adversary. He was a zealous worker, earnest in every undertaking, devoting himself to the pursuits which lay out before him; and, Mr. Speaker, in his death this House and the country have sustained a loss, an irreparable loss, because in this world each has his own work to do, and that work ceases when he dies.

EDWARD COOKE was not called a great man. If he had lived longer, he might have been. But I now claim for him that which is better—he was a good man, an honest, a just, a useful man, and all who came in contact with him in the sphere of his citizenship will miss him.

But the greatest loss, that which is felt most keenly and leaves a wound too deep for healing, is the one which comes to the domestic circle, the home.

Mr. COOKE was a devoted son, an affectionate and loyal brother, and, being an unmarried man, he poured out all the wealth of his affections at the feet of his old mother and his kindred. That mother had taught his toddling steps in infancy and with watchful and gentle care had guided him through the critical stages of childhood and youth, and when he had reached man's estate and had secured a footing in the pathway of life he did not forget her, but turned with grateful affection and remembrance to her and gave her the best of his life. He had become her staff and her support.

I stood at the side of his grave, Mr. Speaker, and saw the hundreds there assembled, a vast concourse of people, coming from all classes, in every station, with saddened faces and sorrowful hearts, and that old mother, her aged form shaken with the agony of grief, the weeping sisters, and the brother whose pallid face and fixed features bespoke the storm of sorrow raging in his heart. I looked upon the heartrending scene and I thought surely it must be in another world that we find compensation for the sorrow and pain we bear in this.

But the hour came to him, as it must come to all. He received a sudden summons; but sad and shocking to us as it was at the time, Mr. Speaker, how beautiful were the incidents attending that last hour. Having spent the evening in social converse with a few chosen friends and bidden them a cheerful good night, he sat down at his table to perform a duty which I am told he never neglected, to write a message of love and dutiful remembrance to that old mother who had ever been so faithful to him. Then, sanctified by the purest and holiest affection known to men on this earth, the love for mother, he folded his hands and closed his eyes. That was his extreme unction, that holy love, that feeling which drives out all sinful emotion and banishes every wicked desire. He folded his hands and closing his eyes fell peacefully and sweetly into a sleep which drifted into that last deep "sleep that knows no waking."

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, it is painful to note how often one who is long a member of this body finds himself standing by the grave of a friend. The subject of our thoughts to-day was born in my county of Dubuque, in a simple little village called Cascade, built by the side of a little stream where flow the pure waters of Iowa. From that place he came to the city of Dubuque and sought an education, and it was there that I first knew Mr. COOKE as a young boy struggling for an education. Perhaps the word "struggling" is unfortunately chosen, for he never seemed to me like a boy that was struggling; he always seemed to me as one who found pleasure—entertainment, in fact—in the discharge of the duties of life.

My good friend who has just preceded me [Mr. DINSMORE] said that Mr. COOKE had not been fortunate in his youth because he had not been blessed with this world's goods; but, Mr. Speaker, that old mother, so tenderly alluded to by my friend from Arkansas, gave him something richer and more precious than gold. She gave him character, and there is nothing better for men in this life than sterling character. She shaped the young life, and shaped it well. I can look back over the years and remember well the face of young ED COOKE, as we always called him, and as I never ceased to call him. It was a face among many thousands—a beautiful, delicate complexion, a genial and pleasant manner, and that eloquent eye, referred to by the gentleman from Arkansas, was conspicuous even then. But politeness—inborn, not cultivated, not assumed—was his marked characteristic. I have often thought, when marking his bearing as a boy, of an old German maxim, which may be translated:

With hat in thy hand, go through the whole land.

This genuine natural courtesy was a marked characteristic of Mr. COOKE, and it neared him and endeared him, if I may so express it, to all who knew him. He went to school in my city, but he had a better school there than our public schools or our high school. He studied law with the firm of Cooley & Eighmey. That firm, I believe, had much to do with shaping the character and subsequent career as a public man of Mr. COOKE. Judge Cooley was ambitious. He had been State senator, Commissioner of Indian Affairs, president of the Southern Claims Commission. He was a man of wonderful address, great power of endurance of work, and possessed of an affability in dealing with his fellow-men that attracted the attention of all who knew him.

He was a man who amassed a very considerable fortune by the exercise of his abilities. The other partner, Mr. Eighmey, was conservative, careful, a man of details, a man whose integrity was never questioned by anyone who knew him, and up to the present hour widows and orphans go to him as their trustee and counselor. He was at all times earnest, and I have often looked upon Mr. Eighmey and thought of the pictures of Lincoln, so solemn, earnest, honest, and yet so gentle and kind. It was with these two men that this graceful boy's character, after being molded and shaped by his mother, took on the form which gave him ambition and armed him with the knowledge of his profession which led to his success. My friend from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE] said he thought there ought to be a better life than this. That thought never occurred to me when I was with Mr. COOKE, for he seemed to feel, as I have always felt, that this world was good enough for him, and he made the best of it. He enjoyed it, and he made others enjoy it, which was still better.

Now, I do not know, but I believe that some feel that there is a sort of aristocracy and democracy in the world beyond. I have always had my doubts about that. If there are boxes there and a dress circle, and a separate place for the common people above, and another place for "the better class," so called, I have never been able to figure it out. But if there is such a place with these distinctions, I think we will all agree that the best ought to have the best, if there is a best; and this I do know, and stand here to vouch for—that Mr. COOKE was one of the best.

We stand by the grave of a friend and look at his monument. To me it is instead a great interrogation point. Where is he? What is he now? I do not undertake to answer such questions. It is enough for me to know and believe that the Infinite Power that laid ED COOKE in his cradle laid him also in his coffin; and with that I am content.

Mr. BELKNAP—

So part we sadly in this troublous world,
To meet with joy in sweet Jerusalem.

Mr. Speaker, these words came into my mind with peculiar force when, on the 24th day of June last, in the early morn, I heard that EDWARD DEAN COOKE was dead. Hastening to his apartment, I found my friend and colleague in the sleep that knows no waking, and gazing upon his peaceful features there came to me the sad and truthful thought, there is nothing certain in life but death.

Leaves have their time to fall,
And flowers to wither at the north wind's breath,
And stars to set; but all,
Thou hast all seasons for thine own, O Death.

Mr. COOKE was an able lawyer and a good citizen, honored and respected by all who knew him. In 1882 the voters of his legislative district elected him a member of the general assembly of Illinois. In that body he served on most important committees. His work was thorough and marked with earnestness, and there he rendered services valuable to his district and to his State. In 1894 he was honored with a seat in the National Congress, receiving a plurality of over 2,000 votes. We can easily imagine how his heart was filled with pride as he raised his hand to take the oath of office, remembering that in early manhood he pored over his law books in Columbian University in this city, where, by his studious habits and persevering effort, he gained the knowledge which in later years brought him preferment and honor. In 1896 he was returned to Congress by a plurality of over 6,000 votes, thus showing that his course met with the high appreciation of his people.

His ambition was not only to occupy, but to fill with honor the place to which he had been elected, and we all know with what unusual earnestness and care he performed his duties in the House of Representatives. One of the most beautiful traits of Mr. COOKE's character was his thorough devotion to his mother. Each day this man of many cares found time to write messages of tenderest love to her who gave him life. To her and those others who were most near and dear to him I well know that, at this time, words of sympathy can have but little meaning; but, Mr. Speaker, we all know that in the providence of the Divine Ruler time with loving hands will lighten the burden of their grief, and they will be comforted by the memory of his noble character and by the record of his manly life. With a grateful heart that I knew ED COOKE so well, and proud that he claimed me as his friend, I close, Mr. Speaker, as I began—

So part we sadly in this troublous world,
To meet with joy in sweet Jerusalem.

Mr. ROYSE. Mr. Speaker, in keeping with the time-honored custom, we have set apart this day to pay a fitting tribute to the memory of our deceased member, EDWARD D. COOKE.

This practice, so early introduced into the American Congress and so closely followed, is a beautiful one, and must exert a wholesome influence upon all who engage in it, as well as upon the public in general.

The work thrown upon a Congressman is exacting. If he is conscientious and faithful, he has but little time for the consideration of other questions.

The subjects to be investigated on this floor are important ones and demand our closest attention and study. The debates which occur are earnest, and sometimes acrimonious, often leading to bitterness of feeling. In our parliamentary contests we sometimes forget everything else but party advantage; the real worthiness and individual merit of our opponent is often entirely lost sight of. We see him only as blocking the way to some coveted advantage. In the zeal for our cause and in our impatience at the obstacles he throws in our way we are apt to ascribe to him unworthy motives and selfish ambitions. When the strife is ended and the heat of the debate is over, we see the man more as he really is—a patriotic American, loving his country, and desiring only the welfare of its people.

But, somehow, we are never able to take the full measure of the man's merit until after he is dead.

In the presence of death our angry contentions are hushed and forgotten. Our criminations and recriminations are at an end. It is strange, when we look into the pale face of our dead friend, how much it reveals to us of that which was truly good and noble in his life and character. We think then only of the cheery smile with which he greeted us and the warm clasp of his hand. We recount his acts, his heroic deeds, his high purposes, his generous impulses. He stands out before us in all his excellence, a creature fit to be the handiwork of God. He now receives the honor which he has justly earned. It is unfortunate that he could not receive more of it while in life. How it would have sweetened his toil and encouraged his effort.

Tardy as it may be, we are here to show our appreciation of EDWARD D. COOKE. Softened and subdued by this solemn occasion we see him in an entirely new light. He now walks in among us clothed in all those virtues most conspicuous in his character. Here and now is the place and time when the tongue of the detractor must be silent. Whatever there may have been of this while he was in life has left no blot upon his good name. Of our dead companion we shall hear nothing except it be good. Of this there is an abundance.

I became acquainted with him on the meeting of the Fifty-fourth Congress in December, 1895. We were put to work together on the Committee on Elections No. 1, and here is where I saw most and learned most of Mr. COOKE. Of this acquaintance I shall speak principally.

No man, unless he has served upon the Committee on Elections, can form any adequate idea of the hard work that it has to perform or the qualities of mind which best fit one for these duties. In many of the cases the evidence is voluminous and closely printed upon poor paper. Parties suit their own convenience in taking it and putting it together, so it is never in an orderly or systematic shape. The work of the committee could be greatly lightened if the parties would classify and arrange this evidence.

But this is not always done, and when it is, it is done so poorly as to afford but little aid. So this important and intricate work invariably falls upon the committee. This task would not be so difficult if all the evidence were pertinent to the real questions at issue, but this is seldom the case. A large mass of it is wholly irrelevant and worthless. This is intermingled with that which is relevant and important, and must be weeded out before you can get at that which throws light upon the dispute. For all this kind of work Mr. COOKE was admirably equipped. He was thorough, patient, and industrious. He was orderly, methodical, and systematic.

In these latter qualities I am disposed to believe that he was superior to any member of the committee. His judgment was clear and discriminating. He arrayed his facts so that their bearing could be seen at a glance. I remember upon one occasion he adopted the form of the bookkeeper and aptly used the words "debtor" and "creditor" to set forth what he believed should be the findings both for and against the parties to the contest. No statement that he ever made was confused or unintelligent. Whether he arrived at the right view or the wrong one, he was sure to set it forth in a clear light. He was painstaking and conscientious and willing to subject himself to any amount of hard work in order to get at the truth.

While he had faith in himself and relied upon his own convictions, yet he was teachable and was always ready to lend an ear to what others had to say. If he found he was in error, no man ever yielded more cheerfully.

He was not overhasty in coming to conclusions, but when his convictions were once formed they were sincere and abiding, and he maintained them with vigor and unfaltering courage.

He was an intense lover of the right and an uncompromising enemy of wrong and of fraud.

No man who had tampered with the elective franchise or sought to hold a seat on this floor which had been obtained by fraud could receive any countenance from Mr. COOKE. Such things were revolting to his honest instincts and his love of fair dealing, yet he was not pharisaical, but considerate and charitable. Hence he was not hasty, not unduly severe in his condemnation of the wrong. He could rebuke the wrong and yet be kind to the wrongdoer. While his pursuit of the wrongdoer was persistent and unhesitating, yet it was not passionate nor pitiless. He was self-poised and even-tempered. This made him conservative, deliberative; not rash nor imprudent. No step was taken without considering well its results.

These things made him an exceedingly reliable and safe man, one not likely to lead you into danger. Such a man, I am quite certain, must have had the confidence and esteem of his constituents. I judge they must have chosen him as their Representative in Congress because of this same confidence and esteem. I also believe he would have retained it. Had he lived he doubtless would have had a long career in public life which would have been creditable both to himself and those who trusted him.

But there would have been none of the intermittent and flash-like brilliancy about his career. His excellence would have burned with a steady and increasing glow, broadening his horizon as the years went by. As a friend and an acquaintance he was gracious, courteous, and sunny, but never gushing, nor given to fulsome flattery. He carried about him a pleasant atmosphere which made you feel easy and comfortable when in his presence. There was nothing of the cynic about him. Every day with him was a good day and gave prophecy of a better one on the morrow.

I have thus given you the portrait of Mr. COOKE as it is pictured upon my memory. Taking him all around, I believe he was a man of sterling worth. His sudden taking off in the full vigor of his manhood and usefulness was indeed pathetic, and left behind it a keen sense of bereavement. But it is comforting to know that the world is better because EDWARD D. COOKE lived in it. He contributed a share to the rich treasures garnered in from the lives of good men. Such a life is not lost. All there was in it of true nobleness has been gathered into the everlasting arms.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, EDWARD DEANE COOKE was a most genial soul. He was thoroughly good natured; never ecstatic, I think, but always smilingly pleasant. He did not aspire to great leadership and made no pretensions to great statesmanship, but he was a critical, careful, and thorough student of some of the pending political problems. He brought no strong passion to the study of a question, but he did bring a quiet desire and determination to seek the truth and do the right.

The city of Chicago mourns his loss because he was patient with her faults, faithful to her interests, careful of her honor, and appreciative of her growth, her hopes, and her destiny. He believed in the great city which sent him as one of her Representatives to the National Legislature. He saw in her present condition more than the realization of the fondest dreams of the past, and he believed in the full success of her future. He was never tired of working in her interest; but he looked outside and beyond the limits of his city into the broad scope and realm of the national problems and the national domain.

For some time prior to his death he had been giving his conscientious consideration to the question of the rights and duties of the United States in relation to the Cuban question. In a conversation with him only a few days prior to his decease he discussed to me some of the phases of that question in, what seemed to me at the time, a most remarkably clear and analytical way. I think that I have heard no one else discuss the subject with so much clearness and depth. He had no passion in this discussion, and yet was not cold-blooded. He had warm sympathy for the suffering Cubans, and yet reenforced his opinions with logic and precedent.

He was a man who was respected by his opponents, admired by his acquaintances, and beloved by his friends. As a lawyer, he had the confidence of both the bench and the bar, and his clients always knew that their interests would be thoroughly protected and conscientiously forwarded. He never betrayed a trust or a friend. No taint ever attached to his character and no suspicion was ever leveled at his acts. He was a man and a gentleman, and I am glad of this opportunity to express my sorrow for his loss and my high appreciation of his sincere and noble qualities.

He had served the public in various capacities and his service was always satisfactory. We who knew him best mourn him most. His term of service in this House had not been extended enough for him to acquire great influence here, but he had easily made a distinct impression on the delegation from his own State and gave promise of rapid development in his Congressional career. The hand of fate took him from our midst and left us to bear without him the burdens and responsibilities which he would so willingly have shared with us and for which by nature he was so well equipped.

The memory of his gladsome ways, his cheerful greeting, his kindly interest, his gentle reasoning, and his friendly manner will long remain green and comforting in my heart.

Mr. BROSIUS. Mr. Speaker, having been associated with Mr. COOKE on an important committee in the last Congress, and sharing in the common illusion that words are the most suitable mode of expressing our sense of loss when friends whom we love or public characters whom the world can ill afford to lose are taken away, I cheerfully embrace the opportunity afforded by this occasion to add one little flower to the chaplet with which affection and esteem have garlanded the memory of our departed friend.

My acquaintance with Mr. COOKE was of short duration, but long enough for him to make conquest of my regard and esteem. He was an attractive character. He possessed qualities of mind and heart which invited confidence and extorted admiration. He was affable, cordial, and courteous. There was no service he would not render a friend with cheerfulness. He was painstaking, industrious, and punctual in the discharge of duty. From what I have heard of him to-day from those who knew him best and from my own observation, I hazard nothing in suggesting that his career exemplifies at least three sterling traits of character—courtesy, duty, and honor. These were at least some of the jewels in the crown of his character, and I set them apart to-day and lift them over his new-made grave as the golden texts in the lesson of his life.

From my observation, and from what I have heard to-day, I think Mr. COOKE was a born gentleman. The finest courtesy characterized his intercourse with his fellow-men. He had a warm, tender, compassionate nature. He was always sensible of what was due to others—which is the very soul of courtesy. His graces of mind and heart, his amiability of character, sweetness of disposition, and gentleness of manner made conquest of universal esteem, and placed him high in the hearts of all who knew him.

His fidelity to duty was conspicuous. No draft ever made upon it went to protest. He was prompt and conscientious in the discharge of all his obligations. He studied public questions with assiduity and intelligence until he acquired a comprehensive grasp of them. On the subject of banking and currency, to the study of which he was called as a member of the committee charged with that subject, and where I was afforded the best view of his character, he was a diligent student and well informed. No person could converse with him on that subject without appreciating, in some measure, at least, the thoroughness of his study and the amplitude of his knowledge.

So on all the varied occasions of life, I believe, Mr. COOKE always bowed before the temple that enshrined the divinity of duty. He illustrated the religion of the shipmaster in the story, who prayed to Neptune, "O God, thou canst save me if thou wilt, or thou canst destroy me; but however it be, I will hold my rudder true." So our departed friend has been twice ennobled. Duty and death ennoble all men.

I think Mr. COOKE was also the very soul of honor, and honor is the noble mind's distinguishing perfection. There was in him no inconstancy of purpose or laxness of morals or insensibility to the claims and obligations of probity and patriotism. His constituents knew him and esteemed him. They trusted him and were never betrayed. They confided in him and found him worthy.

But our friend has closed his earthly career. He did not live out man's appointed years. The mysterious clock which the angel of life wound up to run three score years and ten before handing the key to the angel of the resurrection, ran down before the lapse of the allotted time. It was not the ripe sheaf that was garnered, not the ripe man full of years, who had enjoyed all life's blessings and finished all life's tasks, but a young man in the fullness of life's bloom, in the vigor of strength, in the midst of his usefulness, with his fortune and his fame yet ahead of him. But he was summoned. Nature, with some rudeness in her touch, in the solitude of his chamber, disengaged the vital cord; and he passed, serenely, I hope, to his final rest on the other shore "of that mysterious river that never yet has borne on any wave the image of a homeward sail."

His call was sudden. But what difference to the good man, who is always ready, whether he go quickly—at a bound—or prolong the journey, whether the candle is blown out or burned out?

Oliver Wendell Holmes once expressed his preference in the suggestion that "it always made his mouth water when he heard of anyone being called suddenly away."

What is death? I remember some one gives an exquisite picture of it in a comparison of rare beauty:

"As the shadows steal at evening over the earth, softly closing the flowers and touching them to sleep, silently and lovingly, in the promise of a bright awakening—so is death."

Still it remains to be said that the manner of this man's death teaches us a great lesson—recalls an incident and illustrates a song.

When Tell's arrow pierced the breast of the tyrant Gessler, and he lay bleeding and dying in the mountain pass, a company of friars of mercy passing along that way surrounded him and sang these words:

With noiseless tread death comes on man,
No plea, no prayer delivers him;
From amidst busy life's unfinished plan,
With sudden hand it severs him;
And ready, or not ready, no delay,
Forth to his judge's bar he must away.

And now, in conclusion, may I say to those who knew him best, who loved him most, and to that fond mother who nourished and cherished him, as they leave the contemplation of his memory, they can carry with them the consolatory reflection, "that while green grass will cover his grave, blue skies bend over it, sweet birds sing near it, and the place will be hallowed ground; yet greener than the grass, fairer than the skies, sweeter than the birds, more hallowed than the grave itself, will be his fragrant memory enshrined with supreme sacredness in their heart of hearts."

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, little need as there is for further words, I can not permit myself to remain entirely silent on this occasion. Our friend made too deep an impression upon me to allow this day to pass without adding to the tributes to his memory by at least a word, a phrase, or a sentence.

My acquaintance with him began in the opening hours of the Fifty-fourth Congress. In that Congress he and I alike began our public service in this body. With the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROYSE] and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE], fortune placed me upon that division of the Committee on Elections upon which Mr. COOKE was also designated to serve.

Upon every occasion it was clear that he was bringing to the performance of his high duties upon that committee a judicial temperament, a disposition to be fair and just to the contesting parties, and a mastery of facts in their detail, as well as the secret of applying to them the true principle of law. In every case except one which came before us his judgment and mine were in accord. Upon one occasion only we differed. It was in the case which has been already referred to, the case of Rinaker vs. Downing. We came to different conclusions, and in the ensuing contest Mr. COOKE rendered the most conspicuous of his public services in this House. It was a contest in which there was something of feeling; and yet, from the very beginning to the end of it, between him and me I believe there was not the slightest trace of irritation. I had learned to respect his judgments before, and by no word of his did he give me reason to think that he did not respect mine.

The argument which he delivered in the House when that case was before it for its decision has been referred to as an able one. It most certainly was able, although delivered while he was suffering from a recent sickness from which he had not recovered. But it was in another part of his duty in that cause where his greatest distinction lies.

It was my duty at that time to examine the work which Mr. COOKE did in the silence of his chamber in that case. Doubtless few members of the House ever read the report which he drew, although it did not bear his name.

I believe I examined every important statement it contained, and examined every report submitted to us in the election contests of the Fifty-fourth Congress. My duties compelled me to examine the reports in many cases of past Congresses. I speak within the restrictions of truth when I say that I have never read a report in an election case the ability of which exceeded that displayed by Mr. COOKE in the majority report in the case to which I have referred.

The facts were voluminous and intricate; the principles of law were important, but doubtful. Our friend displayed in that report a mastery of detail, a clearness of statement, and a power to apply the principles of law to ascertained facts which I have never seen surpassed in this House or elsewhere.

It was not alone, Mr. Speaker, in the duties to which his committee appointments called him that our friend disclosed his powers here. I soon began to know that when the House assembled daily the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. COOKE] was in his seat; that he was watching the course of public business, not hastily interfering and seeking to make a display where he had no knowledge, but seeking to perform his full duty to his constituency and to the country. When I learned of his death, it came to me as a shock and an admonition.

We are in the habit of believing that as we one and another pass from this world, out of sight beneath the surface, we leave little trace behind us; that there is always some one ready to take the place which we have left vacant. But who can measure the extent of the loss of the community when a brave, steadfast, courageous, loyal man, such as he whom we commemorate to-day, passes away? Our comfort is that his memory will be an inspiration to his constituency and to the people of the great State which he represented, and an inheritance among his loving friends and kindred through all the days to come.

Mr. GRAFF. Death seldom comes other than as an untimely and cruel visitor. The departed babe who has left behind us sweetest memories of a heavenly visitation; the loss of a child in boyhood or girlhood, giving him or her only a view of life while the world glistened with the dew of youth; the death of our dear ones when aged and infirm, when it must come to them as a longed-for relief, all, all of these experiences pierce our hearts deeply and bring to most of us a rebellious feeling against unreasonable and illogical death. Why to us all does death seem always too soon? There is much more sincere doubt as to the true philosophy of this life than there is of doubt as to immortality.

No matter what the span of life has been, nor how much of splendid achievement, pleasure, or even deeds of mercy have been crowded into it, we would fain linger yet a little longer and justify the living. There is always a sense of the incompleteness of life. The more successful, the more noble the life, the more filled its future is of opportunity, the more unreasonable is death. Of what avail is all this mental development and character culture? May I not suggest that this life is only a part of our existence, only a stage of our development, a simply "passing on."

From a human standpoint, EDWARD DEAN COOKE, my late colleague from the Sixth district of the State of Illinois, departed this life at what seems to me the hardest period of any at which death can come. He was 47 years old. The glamor of boyhood had gone, the disappointments and struggles which come to almost every man in securing a place for himself in professional life had been met and overcome. He had reached the age when the climax of mental strength approaches; when cynicism gives place to a belief in humanity, fixed convictions, and charity; when the years begin to soften and the mind to broaden and philosophy comes in to help us meet our inevitable troubles. The years before are a preparation.

This is the age of contentment, if it is to come. Here man reaches his highest measure. Here life begins to sweeten. Yet here he was, in this honorable body, where perhaps his ambition had been pointing him for years, in his second term, with splendid prospects of an influential position in this House, and working to that end, not impatiently, but painstakingly and ably. Some do not like the life here. He did. He has told me so. None can earn any permanent and prominent position here who does not plan to pursue this career through a period of years. He was a good lawyer, most exact in his knowledge, most accurate in his conclusions. Yet in this solemn hour, when the thought of death and the future is upon us, I think he would consider it more important, as do we, to know that he was as a man rather than as a lawyer or legislator.

It is not so much what we do as what we are. Achievement may depend more largely upon the accident of environment and opportunity than upon ourselves. Hundreds of men before us in this House have attempted to leave a permanent impress upon public life and have failed. How few of those who have thus striven we can remember. But the influence of private character we can not even restrain. It goes on forever and forever. We can only give it direction.

I did not know Mr. COOKE intimately, as did those of the Illinois delegation who represented with him his great city. But the short acquaintance with him that was my privilege moves me at this time to pay this honest tribute.

He was remarkable for his manly gentleness. It commanded a respect and won a regard for him at once and everywhere he met men. He was courteous, but sincerely courteous—a most rare gift. He was forceful, but not brutally and offensively so. Men would like to see a man like this one win his victories and enjoy his success. He was elevated in his ideas and a clean man. There was the marked influence of a pure-hearted mother yet upon him. His conversation was for gentlemen.

I am glad to pay this tribute to one of our number and that he honestly deserved it, and to express my sincere sorrow for his sudden death.

It has become popular to assert, either directly or indirectly, that the trend of political life is toward corruption and sordidness. It is not so. The motive which brought here the most of the men who are in this body was the patriotic desire that their ideas might be woven into the warp and woof of this greatest Republic. I glory in the memory of EDWARD COOKE because he was a product of American citizenship, because he was a type of which I hope and believe there are many others in this Chamber. Inscrutible as it may seem to us now, from a human standpoint, that this untimely death should have occurred, I believe—

That we will shortly know that lengthened breath
Is not the sweetest gift God gives His friend,
And that sometimes this sable pall of death
Conceals the fairest boon His love can send.
But not to-day. Then be content, sad heart.
God's plans, like lilies, pure and white, unfold;
We must not tear the close-shut leaves apart;
Time will reveal the calyxes of gold.
And if, through patient toil, we reach the land
Where tired feet, with sandals loosed, may rest,
When we shall clearly know and understand,
I think that we will say "God knew the best."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolutions.

The resolutions were agreed to.

Accordingly, under the terms of the concurrent resolution heretofore agreed to, the Speaker (at 2 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) declared the House adjourned until January 5, 1898, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a photograph of work on the La Mesa Dam, in California, with the request that it be included in the report on reservoir sites in Wyoming and Colorado—to the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, submitting a report on agriculture in Alaska—to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting for consideration and ratification an agreement between the commissioners of the United States to negotiate with the Five Civilized Tribes and the commission on the part of the Muskogee or Creek Nation, together with certain reports bearing thereon—to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the report of the commanding officer of Watertown Arsenal of "tests of iron, steel, and other materials for industrial purposes," made at the arsenal during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897—to the Committee on Appropriations.

A letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, requesting the printing of 2,500 copies of the report on agriculture in Alaska for his Department—to the Committee on Printing.

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the case of Jacob H. Lindsey against The United States—to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the finding filed by the court in the case of J. S. Goss, administrator of J. S. Lee, against The United States—to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers, with accompanying report, submitting designs and estimates for a stone arch bridge and for a steel bridge with stone foundations over Rock Creek, on the line of Massachusetts avenue extended—to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

A message from the President of the United States, transmitting papers relating to claims for indemnity by the Norwegian steamer Nicaragua—to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A message from the President of the United States, transmitting a report from the Secretary of State relating to proposed action under section 4086, Revised Statutes of the United States—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS INTRODUCED.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. DAVIDSON of Wisconsin (by request): A bill (H. R. 5430) to prevent the desecration of the national flag—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HEPBURN: A bill (H. R. 5431) for the investigation of leprosy—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5432) for the investigation of pollution of water supplies—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5433) for the purchase of site and erection of building for the hygienic laboratory of the Marine-Hospital Service—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. CLAYTON: A bill (H. R. 5434) to repeal in part and to limit section 3480 of the Revised Statutes of the United States—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. CURTIS of Iowa: A bill (H. R. 5435) for the construction of a public building at Clinton, Iowa—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. CALLAHAN: A bill (H. R. 5436) fixing the qualifications of all officers to be appointed for the Territories of Oklahoma, New Mexico, Arizona, and the District of Columbia—to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

By Mr. STEPHENS of Texas: A bill (H. R. 5437) to amend the act relating to Indian depredations—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. BRENNER of Ohio (by request): A bill (H. R. 5438) increasing the rate of pension in cases of partial or total deafness—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BRODERICK: A bill (H. R. 5439) providing for the sale of the surplus lands on the Pottawatomie and Kickapoo Indian reservations in Kansas, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 5, 1898.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

Mr. LEE MANTLE, a Senator from the State of Montana, appeared in his seat to-day.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, December 18, 1897, when, on motion of Mr. MILLS, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

BELLS FOR RUSSIAN CHURCH.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, at the request of the Secretary of State, a draft of a bill providing for the entry, free of customs duties, of certain bells presented by the Emperor of Russia to the Orthodox Russian Church at Bridgeport, Conn., and recommending that it be enacted into law; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

EMPLOYEES IN LIBRARY OF CONGRESS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Librarian of Congress, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 17th ultimo, a statement showing the names of the employees appointed by him to places in the Library, together with the States or Territories from which they were severally appointed, and also information as to the special library training or experience of such appointees prior to the time of their appointment; which was referred to the Committee on the Library, and ordered to be printed.

SURVEY OF FOREST RESERVES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 15th ultimo, a letter from the Director of the Geological Survey, together with a full and complete report of the operations of that Survey in carrying out the provisions of the sundry civil appropriation act approved June 4, 1897, providing for the survey of the public lands that have been or may hereafter be designated as forest reserves by Executive proclamation under section 24 of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1891; which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

RAILWAY AND STEAMSHIP MAIL CONTRACTS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Postmaster-General, transmitting, in response to resolutions of the 18th ultimo, a report of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General for 1897, giving all railway and steamship mail contracts, the names of the persons or companies with whom made, the services to be performed, and the sum to be paid by the United States, etc.; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 16th ultimo, a report of the Commissioner of Railroads, together with an itemized statement of the receipts and expenditures of the Central Pacific Railroad for each year from 1871 to 1897, showing the amounts expended for subsidies to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company and the amount paid into the sinking fund each year; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Pacific Railroads, and ordered to be printed.

THE CIVIL SERVICE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Agriculture, stating, in response to resolutions of the 18th ultimo regarding changes in the civil-service law, that the chief trouble found in the Department of Agriculture exists in the Bureau of Animal Industry between inspectors, assistant inspectors, stock examiners, covered into the service without examination, etc.; which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to resolutions of the 18th ultimo, certain information relative to the appointed positions in that Department which should be excepted from the operations of the laws governing the civil service or the rules established by the Civil Service Commission, and also suggesting certain changes or amendments to the present civil-service rules.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the communication be printed and referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That will be the order, in the absence of objection.

Mr. ALLISON. As it is the answer of one of the Departments to a resolution applicable to all of them, I suggest to the Senator from Maine that as the answers come in they be printed together in a document, so that we may have all the communications in that form.

Mr. HALE. I think that is a very proper suggestion.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand that every head of Department intends at an early day to communicate his views.

Mr. HALE. So, in addition to the reference to the committee, let all be printed together as one document for the use of the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, let all on that subject be printed together for the use of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the request of the Senator from Maine? The Chair hears none, and that is the order.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. LODGE, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by himself on the 18th instant, intended to be proposed to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, reported it with an amendment, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed; which was agreed to.

REPORT OF LIBRARIAN OF CONGRESS.

Mr. LODGE, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate 1,000 bound copies of the report of the Librarian of Congress for 1897, 500 for the use of the Senate and 500 for distribution by the Librarian of Congress.

Mr. LODGE. I will state that the expense of the publication will be less than $500. It is recommended by the Library Committee and also by the Librarian of Congress.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

DOMESTIC MONEY ORDERS.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am instructed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to report a bill to amend section 4034 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by section 9 of an act entitled "An act to improve the methods of accounting in the Post-Office Department, and for other purposes," approved January 27, 1894. I had intended to ask unanimous consent to take the bill up at this time, but I am informed that there is objection to the bill being taken up at the moment. But the bill is of an important character; it comes through communication the committee has had with the Post-Office Department, and I give notice that to-day or to-morrow, or at as early a day as I can, I shall, on behalf of the committee, ask the Senate to consider the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. It should be read twice to-day.

Mr. COCKRELL. I object to the second reading of the bill. If it is to be railroaded through we want a little time to look into it and investigate it. In my opinion, there is not such an emergency as would justify forcible action upon it to-day.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Very well. I will ask to have the bill read twice.

Mr. COCKRELL. No; I object to its second reading.

Mr. ALLISON. Let it have its first reading.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Let the bill be read the first time.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Let the bill be read in full.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I should like to have it read at length.

The bill (S. 3031) to amend section 4034 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by section 9 of an act entitled "An act to improve the methods of accounting in the Post-Office Department, and for other purposes," approved January 27, 1894, was read the first time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 4034 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by section 9 of an act entitled "An act to improve the methods of accounting in the Post-Office Department, and for other purposes," approved January 27, 1894, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"The Postmaster-General shall furnish money-order offices with printed or engraved blanks for domestic money orders, the form of which shall be prescribed by him; and no money order shall be valid unless drawn upon such form."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill goes over on its first reading.

Mr. KYLE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

REVENUE CUTTER DANIEL MANNING.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanious consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to organize a board of not less than three competent persons, whose duty it shall be to inquire into and determine how much the hull, machinery, and appurtenances of the U. S. revenue cutter Daniel Manning, contracted for by the Department, cost the contractors over and above the contract price, if anything, and report the same to the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to state in regard to the resolution just passed that it is addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury in the form of a request, because he is not strictly obliged to comply, though it has been the practice of the Senate heretofore to make such a request.

POSTAL SAVINGS BANKS, ETC.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, on July 12, 1897, the Senate passed a resolution directing the Secretary of State "to send to the diplomatic representatives of the United States abroad a circular letter similar to the one sent by Secretary Blaine on May 20, 1881, instructing them to obtain from the several foreign governments to which they are accredited as full information as possible (including copy of laws relating thereto) as to the nature and practical workings (including expenses, receipts, and rates) of the postal telegraphs, telephones, and postal savings banks of such countries as have adopted the same."

The same resolution directed the Secretary of State to secure that information and to send it to the Senate upon the opening of Congress last December, or as soon thereafter as possible. On July 17, 1897, the Secretary of State issued the circular letter of instructions to our diplomatic representatives abroad, and on the 23d of July he transmitted to the Senate a copy of the official circular letter, which was printed in Senate Document No. 187, Fifty-fifth Congress.

I have in my hand a message from the President of the United States, which was sent to the Senate December 18, containing a report from the Secretary of State in compliance with the Senate resolution of July 12, and transmitting the reports of our diplomatic representatives, with accompanying documents, to the Senate. I find, however, that the reports and documents, twenty-five in number, which were sent by our diplomatic representatives from the various countries having postal savings banks, postal telegraphs, and telephones have not been printed. The original copies are all stored away in a pigeonhole or room. Of course the information the Senate wanted is in those reports and accompanying documents, as the questions of postal savings banks, postal telegraphs, and telephones are now pending before Congress.

Therefore, I ask unanimous consent that this message of the President to the Senate, under date of December 18, 1897, and the twenty-five replies from our diplomatic representatives referred to in said message, the original copies of which are now on file in the Committee on Printing and have not been printed, together with the circular letter of instruction sent out by the State Department on July 17, 1897, be printed as a Senate document.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from North Carolina?

There being no objection, the order was reduced to writing, and agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That the message of the President to the Senate, under date of December 18, 1897, relating to postal telegraphs, telephones, and postal savings banks, and the twenty-five replies from our diplomatic representatives referred to in said message, the original copies of which are now on file in the Committee on Printing and have not been printed, together with the circular letter of instructions sent out by the State Department on July 17, 1897, be printed as a Senate document.

LAWS RELATING TO COINAGE AND CURRENCY.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I rise for the purpose of making an inquiry of the chairman of the Committee on Printing.

I think it was at the first session of the Fifty-fourth Congress that we ordered the republication of the coinage laws and laws relating to loans and currency, to be bound in one volume with certain statistical matter, and an index to be compiled. That order has been complied with only partially. The laws relating to the coinage, loans, and currency have been reprinted in pamphlet form, but no statistical matter has been gathered, no index has been prepared, and the pamphlets have not been bound. That was a year and a half ago. I should like to know from the chairman of the Committee on Printing whether we are to expect the completion of that work soon; and if so, how soon?

Mr. LODGE. I have no recollection of the resolution to which the Senator refers. If I understand rightly, it relates to printing the currency laws.

Mr. ALLEN. The coinage laws and the currency laws, and they have been reprinted, I think. There are four little books, which it was intended should be bound in one volume. The resolution called for their reprint in that form with certain statistical matter appropriately indexed and bound. The work has never been done.

Mr. LODGE. I do not recall the resolution at this moment. But such resolutions are disposed of as fast as they come in, and it must be through some accident if there has been any delay. I shall look the matter up.

Mr. ALLEN. I suggest to the chairman the propriety of looking up the matter.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly. It must be owing to some accident.

Mr. ALLEN. And see that the work is completed.

Mr. LODGE. I shall look it up at once.

LETTER OF HON. R. P. PORTER ON THE ELEVENTH CENSUS.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, it will be remembered that prior to the recess the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], in a discussion of the so-called civil-service question, presented a letter from Hon. Carroll D. Wright, Commissioner of Labor, which he had received, and of which I had also received a copy. In that letter the methods and the expense of taking the Eleventh Census were very severely criticised.

I called attention subsequently to a letter which Hon. Robert P. Porter wrote for the Philadelphia Inquirer, and on the 20th day of December last I addressed a letter to Mr. Porter, asking him for an expression of his opinion as to the questions raised by Colonel Wright. Under date of January 3 Mr. Porter addressed a letter to me which I now have, and which I desire in some way to bring to the attention of the Senate.

Mr. Porter very severely criticises Colonel Wright's arguments and figures, declaring that they are utterly misleading and false, and at great length gives his opinion touching the questions that are in controversy.

I do not want to delay the Senate to read this very interesting letter of Mr. Porter, but rise simply for the purpose of asking that it may be printed as a document for the use of the Senate, and to request Senators to take the trouble to read the letter, which I think will shed a great deal of light upon the question the Senator from Massachusetts projected in his discussion of this important subject.

I ask that the letter of Mr. Porter be printed as a document for the use of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none; and it is so ordered.

SILVER COINAGE AND COIN REDEMPTION.

Mr. TELLER. I offer a concurrent resolution, which I ask to have read, printed, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The concurrent resolution was read, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

Whereas by the act entitled "An act to strengthen the public credit," approved March 18, 1869, it was provided and declared that the faith of the United States was thereby solemnly pledged to the payment, in coin or its equivalent, of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of such obligations had expressly provided that the same might be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver; and

Whereas all the bonds of the United States authorized to be issued by the act entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," approved July 14, 1870, by the terms of said act were declared to be redeemable in coin of the then present standard value, bearing interest payable semi-annually in such coin; and

Whereas all bonds of the United States authorized to be issued under the act entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," approved January 14, 1875, are required to be of the description of bonds of the United States described in the said act of Congress approved July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt;" and

Whereas at the date of the passage of said act of Congress last aforesaid, to wit, the 14th day of July, 1870, the coin of the United States of standard value of that date included silver dollars of the weight of 412½ grains each, declared by the act approved January 18, 1837, entitled "An act supplementary to the act entitled 'An act establishing a mint and regulating the coins of the United States,'" to be a legal tender of payment, according to their nominal value, for any sums whatever: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring therein), That all the bonds of the United States issued, or authorized to be issued, under the said acts of Congress hereinbefore recited, are payable, principal and interest, at the option of the Government of the United States, in silver dollars, of the coinage of the United States, containing 412½ grains each of standard silver; and that to restore to its coinage such silver coins as a legal tender in payment of said bonds, principal and interest, is not in violation of the public faith, nor in derogation of the rights of the public creditor.

CONSIDERATION OF HAWAIIAN TREATY.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire to give notice that on Monday next, at the conclusion of the morning business, I shall move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business for the purpose of considering the Hawaiian treaty. I also give notice that I shall move an executive session each day thereafter until the matter is closed.

PRINTING OF TESTIMONY.

Mr. TELLER. In 1892 a committee of this body took some testimony in California concerning a public reservation, which has never been printed. I desire to use it in connection with another subject. It is a small matter, and I ask that it be printed in the regular form.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That order will be made, in the absence of objection.

RESTRICTION OF IMMIGRATION.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, if there is no further morning business to be presented to the Senate, I wish to call up for discussion Senate bill 112, to amend the immigration laws of the United States, and ask that it may be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURROWS in the chair). The Chair lays before the Senate the bill referred to by the Senator from Nebraska, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 112) to amend the immigration laws of the United States.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, on the 13th day of last month, and when this bill was called up for consideration by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who pressed for an immediate vote, I objected, and in doing so said:

When the Senator from Massachusetts brought up this matter a few days ago, I supposed it was his purpose to make it the unfinished business and have it debated at times which were convenient until some day, probably next month, when we could agree upon a time for a vote. I am perfectly willing now that the Senator should fix some day, say along about the 15th of January, when a vote shall be taken on the bill; but I am not prepared to say, Mr. President—and that is a thing I want time to settle for myself—that an educational test is the true test of the right of an individual to come to this country.

As I am impressed at this time, I think we ought to have some restrictions, possibly more than we now have, on the right of immigration; but I can readily conceive that a very honest but possibly illiterate man may come to this country who has all the qualifications of making a good citizen—honest, industrious, peaceable, and well disposed to the Government—and yet his early surroundings may have been such that he was unable to obtain an education in his own country sufficiently to enable him to read or to write. In such a case as that I am not prepared to say that an educated anarchist or criminal is preferable to such an individual as a citizen. That is one of the features of this bill I should like to examine; and I hope the Senator will ask unanimous consent to have the bill brought to a vote at some time next month, after the Senate reconvenes, so that we may have ten days or two weeks to discuss it.

It went over on my objection, and finally, by a unanimous-consent agreement, Monday, January 17, was fixed as the date on which a final vote should be taken on the bill and all amendments. Subsequent examination of the measure has satisfied me that my objection was timely and that the bill should not pass.

Its opening clause is too far-reaching and excludes "all persons physically capable over 16 years of age who can not read and write the English language, or some other language." This wording is quite too broad, and if the bill were enacted into a law it would exclude thousands of very worthy foreign-born persons who would, under the persuasive influence of our Government, if admitted, make excellent citizens.

When the bill was before the second session of the Fifty-fourth Congress, I find by an examination of the RECORD that on a yea-and-nay vote to postpone to a given time I am recorded as not voting. On a proposed amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] "that this act shall not apply to persons arriving in the United States from any port or place in the Island of Cuba during the continuance of the present disorder there, provided that such persons have heretofore been inhabitants of that island," I am recorded as voting "aye." On another amendment of the same Senator, now not important to be considered, I voted to lay on the table, and on the final passage of the bill I voted "aye." The bill passed both Houses of Congress, was sent to the President for his approval, and was vetoed. It was not again brought to the attention of the Senate, as I now recollect its history, but was permitted to drop for that session, and now it has made its appearance again.

I am satisfied my final vote on the passage of the bill at the last Congress was an error and that a closer inspection of its sweeping terms would have induced me to vote against it, and I now avail myself of the first opportunity presented to correct the error, and I shall, when the bill is put on its final passage, if in its present form, vote against it.

Mr. President, I am fully conversant with the fact that we have been very liberal in our immigration policy, and that we have permitted some of those born in other countries to become citizens of this nation who were not in all respects fully qualified at the time for the citizenship of a republic, but I can not vote to exclude good men and good women born elsewhere than in the United States who may come to this country to take on themselves the duties and responsibilities of citizenship and better their conditions. Of course many of them may not, and quite likely did not, in their early life have an opportunity to learn the art of reading and writing; but the ability to read and write is not education, although, of course, it is of primary and indispensable importance. It is quite a common mistake many of our young men and young women of to-day make in believing that when they leave their schools with a certificate of graduation their education is complete. But I have known most excellent persons who could neither read nor write; they were intelligent and successful in life, but had been deprived of this needed primary education.

There should be some other and better test applied than that of the mere ability to read and write some language, desirable as that is. Many of the worst characters that have come to America from Europe can read and write, and in that sense may be said to be educated, and this class could be admitted under the provisions of this bill, regardless of their character or fitness in other respects. Herr John Most is said to be an educated man. He is a gold bug and in 1896 voted the Republican ticket, and yet he is admitted on all hands to be the most notorious anarchist of the country, and has stirred up more lawlessness and done more in the last ten years to bring our country and its immigration laws into disrepute than any other individual in the United States.

Let the test of admission be based on something practical. Let us institute a system of consular inspection in the district in which the proposed immigrant lives before he embarks and incurs the expense and inconvenience of a perilous trip across the ocean. That would be a practical method of reaching the difficulty, for before the consul it might be shown by competent evidence that, while not possessed of the ability to read the Constitution in any language, still he had an adequate conception of our form of government, was honest, industrious, healthy, self-supporting, and energetic, and if found to possess these qualifications, why should we not permit him to come here and establish a home, and as rapidly as he could otherwise qualify himself become a citizen of the United States?

Sir, I admit that it would be unwise for us to imperil our institutions by too great laxity in our laws, but I take it for granted that no gentleman desires to do this. It would not do to allow a horde of men who are alien in feeling and sentiment to a republican form of government, or who have an inadequate conception of the sacredness of our institutions, to come to our shores. We should be careful in this respect and know that we are able to assimilate our immigrants as we receive them, and if we should take these and like precautions, which I think we can do under present laws if our immigration and naturalization acts are properly executed, our institutions will not be imperiled in any degree by desirable immigrants.

And right here, sir, I want to say that we have laws against the importation of contract laborers which are almost hourly, daily, weekly, monthly, and yearly violated by those who advocate a high protective policy and who cry out against the importation of articles manufactured in foreign countries by foreign laborers, who themselves violate the laws of the United States in bringing here such laborers to be thrown into deadly conflict with our American laboring people.

To one familiar with the manner in which our immigration laws have been administered the bill under consideration must be regarded as a grim sarcasm. We know it has been the policy in the East to import contract laborers of alien races, and even criminals in some instances, for the express purpose of reducing the condition of the American laboring man. That such of our people as have engaged in violating the law should now be really concerned for the preservation of our institutions is not to be believed.

Mr. President, we should not forget that the policy of this country has been to admit all duly qualified persons who can be readily assimilated, and who are willing to conform to our usages and customs, and who are attached to a republican form of government, and who will take on themselves the duties and responsibilities of citizenship. In fact, we have from the organization of the Government from every newspaper and rostrum in the land declared the United States to be the asylum of the oppressed of all nations and that here, under the ægis of our flag, all who love liberty and are willing to abjure allegiance to the king or potentate of whom they were former subjects shall in the course of time become citizens and receive our protection.

And now the Committee on Immigration propose reversing this policy, because, in the greed of certain sections to obtain cheap labor, they have been overrun by Mongols and by a horde of criminals from the ports of Europe. We should not, however, permit this fact to prevent us doing full justice to the liberty loving of the world who wish to enjoy our institutions, and whose accession will support rather than endanger our Government. Those who are adapted by blood, habits, and disposition to become respectable and responsible citizens, and who, instead of endangering our institutions, will give aid and assistance in the hour of peril, should be admitted as formerly. We should not forget that in our struggle for liberty we could not have succeeded had it not been for the valuable aid given us by men of foreign birth, and in every great and critical epoch of our national history, at the crucial moment, men born in other climes and under other suns have sacrificed their lives and fortunes to uphold our dignity and the sovereignty of our country.

Mr. President, in my own State there are a very large number of foreign-born people, who, as a rule, are highly desirable and add greatly to our energy and thrift. We have room for more such men and women, but we have no room for native or foreign born who are alien in sentiment to the true interest of the State or the greatness and glory of the country, and who would not sacrifice life, if necessary, to preserve the flag and perpetuate the Union.

These are, as a rule, a religious people, and their churches and schoolhouses dot our hillsides and valleys throughout the State. They pay their taxes and perform their duties nobly and well. They are patrons of education, believe in progress, peace, and good order. Such a people should not be excluded from the blessings of a free government because of their place of birth.

I will readily admit that ethnic conditions should enter into the question, and I would cheerfully vote to exclude any of the various tribes of Mongols as alien in sympathy and whose presence here would impair, if not endanger, the nation. But for the man or woman who belongs to the Caucasian race, wherever he or she may have been born, who looks to this country for aid and protection, and who in turn is willing to give to it of his or her strength of body and mind a full measure of service for its preservation and perpetuity, I would open the gates until the millions of acres of our land now lying idle are occupied, brought into cultivation, and made to yield to the commerce of the world their boundless wealth.

THE CENSUS.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the morning business being concluded, I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 94, known as the census bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 94) to provide for the Twelfth and subsequent censuses.

Mr. CARTER. The bill has been read heretofore, I believe, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill has been heretofore read, and is now in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. CARTER. I ask that the amendment known as section 3 be amended, in lines 5 and 6, on page 4, by striking out the words "Secretary of the Interior" and in lieu thereof inserting the word "President."

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be read, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the bill has been already read. The Senator from Montana proposes an amendment which has just been stated. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the amendment be read from the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated by the Secretary.

Mr. HALE. Let the original text be read, so that we may see where the amendment applies.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes; let the whole text be read. Has the report on that bill been read, Mr. President? I do not remember that it has been.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands not.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then let the report be read.

Mr. CARTER. The report in the case was exceedingly brief, and referred only to the amendments made to the bill, designating the points where inserted and the character of the amendments. The only material amendment made to the bill is in section 3, and to that section as amended another amendment is this morning proposed, making the rules to be fixed for the examination of applicants for the service subject to the approval of the President, instead of approval by the Secretary of the Interior, as provided in the amendment originally submitted by the committee. This proposed amendment is offered for the purpose of harmonizing the bill with the theory upon which it was originally framed. The amendment of the committee proposing that the rules and regulations be approved by the Secretary of the Interior was offered and adopted upon the supposition at the time, which proved to be erroneous upon reflection, that the census would be taken under the jurisdiction of the Interior Department. Upon careful examination it will be found that the theory of the bill contemplates the establishment of a bureau independent of the Interior Department or any other Department. In view of this fact it was deemed inexpedient to refer the matter of rules or regulations to the head of any Department, and it was deemed wise to leave the matter of approval to the President direct.

Mr. COCKRELL. In other words, the bill, as I understand, creates a new department practically, a census office, with a head responsible to the President.

Mr. CARTER. A census office, the head of which is to be responsible to the President direct.

Mr. COCKRELL. And the amendment takes the Census Office from under the civil-service law and places in the head of that new bureau the appointment of all the employees under it.

Mr. CARTER. It places the appointments as designated in the bill in the hands of the President primarily, the examination under which persons are to be admitted to the service to be conducted under such rules and regulations as the director of the census, subject to the approval of the President, may from time to time prescribe.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Missouri will bear in mind what was brought out in the discussion which took place here before the holiday recess, that this bill does not cover in any degree the large census force which will be required to do the census work. It only provides for a temporary force, which is to report to Congress a scheme for taking the census and to do the preliminary work. It does not involve anything like the force of a department in extent, but is the preliminary measure which the committee is now taking in order to set the work afoot at the proper time. Then will come the main question as to whether the great census work shall be done under the civil-service law or outside of it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand right the reverse of what the Senator says. This is the permanent part of the Census Office—absolutely permanent—and the others who are to come in to do the work of collecting statistics will be the temporary census force. This bill puts the Census Office outside of and beyond the pale of the civil-service law, so that the President can not put it under that law. In other words, you are repealing the civil-service law. It is a square, unconditional surrender by the Republican party of every pretension it has ever made in behalf of the civil-service law—square and unequivocal—and you can not evade the issue. The President can except this office, if he so desires, from the operation of the civil-service law. Congress has no right to do it unless you intend to repeal the whole civil-service law and tie the President's hands so that he can not make exceptions to the law.

Under the existing civil-service law the President can except any office from its operation; he can except any bureau from its operation; he can except any class of officers from its operation; he can revoke any special order which has been made by his predecessor in regard to positions under the civil-service law, and leave no civil-service machinery at all. The matter is entirely within his power. Your President is professing to-day to be in favor of the civil-service law, and you are trying to relieve him from responsibility in the matter by coming in and repealing the law. You gentlemen have got to meet the issue squarely and fairly. You have declared in favor of the civil-service law in your national platforms, and your President has the power to amend, revise, or annul the rules made under it. Let it remain in the hands of the President and let him be responsible.

I voted for the civil-service law because the Republican party was then in power and said their civil service needed reformation and they could not reform it unless such a law was passed. I voted for it to enable a Republican Administration to reform its civil service. It gave to the President what? Nothing on earth that he did not before possess. The President had before this law was passed every particle of authority he has to-day, but he would not exercise it. We passed a law telling him that he could exercise it, and first a Republican President, General Arthur, exercised it and placed certain branches of the Government service under it.

President Cleveland came in and exercised it and extended the operation of the law further and further. President Harrison came in and ratified and confirmed what President Cleveland had done, and extended it still further and further. Then President Cleveland, when he came in again, made a wider extension. Now, President McKinley has come in and stands by what President Cleveland has done, and proposes to extend it still further; and now you gentlemen here propose to take away from him the discretion which he holds and exercises; you propose by legislation to put this office in such a position that he can not place it under the civil-service law, and so that appointments may be made upon any kind of indorsements and recommendations which may be deemed proper. It is not just to your President to do it; it is not fair; it is a step backward; it is in violation of your party platform; it is in violation of the public pledges of your President; and now we shall see whether you will do it or not. We want you to face the music.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will allow me a moment, he is himself unduly sensitive about civil-service methods being applied to the census work. The whole subject of civil service has never been a political subject. The original bill, which is the foundation of the practice of the Government since its enactment into law, was introduced here and championed by the other side of the Chamber, and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] voted for it, as I did, presented, as it was, and advocated by a then distinguished Senator, Mr. Pendleton, of Ohio, whom we all of us remember with regard and affection, and who was the champion of civil service, reporting it from a Democratic committee. We were glad to pass the bill, that seemed to involve in it some measure of reform as to public service and the method of appointing subordinates in the different Departments.

Now, this is a matter of plain business. The census has never been under the civil service. The census of 1880 was not under the civil service.

Mr. COCKRELL. That was before the civil-service law was passed.

Mr. HALE. The census of 1890 was not under the civil service. It never had been under the civil service, and it never has been under the civil service since the law was passed; and the Committee on the Census in the present Congress, which has reported through its chairman, considering the subject, came unanimously to the conclusion that in launching a new census it would not put it under the civil service; that this temporary work which is provided for here, not the main, final work of taking the census of 1900, but the work of getting ready, should not be put under the civil service, but should be left where it always has been, the director making the appointments, the rules under which they should be made to be submitted to and approved by the President. So no discretion is taken away from him; there is no innovation; there is no back track taken.

I have had some experience in this matter. I had the honor of being chairman of the committee that finished up the census of 1880 and undertook and carried out and performed the work of the census of 1890. I did not then think, I do not now think, that the peculiar work and duties that are required in the census would be better performed if put under the civil service. In providing what has always been the law and always been the practice in regard to this work, no attack is made upon the President or the platform of the Republican party or the attitude of the Democratic party when Mr. Pendleton reported the civil-service bill from a Democratic committee and put it through. The committee had no thought of making an attack of that kind, and was following in the beaten ways of this work.

I believe the bill will be better if left as the chairman reports it, and that if the appointments, not many, to do this work—how long they will be continued I do not know, but they will not do the great work of taking the census—are left in this way, we will get a better class of men to do the work than we would if we adopted the other method, which we never have adopted heretofore.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the pending bill contemplates the establishment of a permanent division for the purpose of carrying on not only this census, but every other one that shall follow.

Mr. HALE. A bureau.

Mr. TELLER. I do not know whether you would call it a bureau. I hardly know what it contemplates, but I presume that is the proper term—a bureau, instead of a division.

It seems to me that that is the place of all others where you should apply the civil service, if you apply it to any other bureau. Whether you ought to apply the civil-service rules to the great body of clerks and employees who must be selected is another question. But this is to be a permanent body. The people are to remain in office, unless we do not apply the civil rules so that they may be turned out, during the coming four years or three years, unquestionably, and if they get into an office where they are liable to stay, they ought to come into it like other people get into the public service.

It will be very different when you come to select two or three thousand more clerks. It may be doubtful whether you can afford to apply the civil-service rules to all those, but you can certainly apply the civil-service rules to the limited number that will be employed in this bureau; and if there is any place, I repeat, where the civil service ought to be applied, it ought to be applied here, which is to be a sort of starting point of the census. The bureau is to lay out and provide for the census, under the direction, of course, of the director or whatever he may be called, and there is no reason that can be given at any time for the use of the civil-service force in the selecting of employees that does not apply to this class of employees, in my judgment.

Mr. HALE. Has the Senator noticed the phraseology of the bill reported by the Senator from Montana providing for this office force?

As a temporary office force, until the force of the Census Office shall be classified and provided for through regular appropriations.

Mr. TELLER. I have; and it struck me at the time that it was for the purpose of enabling a lot of people to be selected without the civil-service rules, to be included immediately under the civil service. I have not the slightest doubt that is the purpose and that that will be the result.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Mr. President, I regret that the bill has been called up by the Senator from Montana while there is no Democratic member of the committee present. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE], who is the senior Democratic member of the committee, is not present; the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE] is not here, nor is the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. MCENERY]; and so far as I am concerned, I would very much prefer that the bill should be discussed when those gentlemen, who have given more personal attention to the matter than I have, are here.

There is one thing, however, which I imagine no Senator will deny, and that is that there were charges of the grossest unfairness in the taking of the censuses of 1880 and 1890. They may or may not have been true. It is due to the American people, however, that hereafter the census shall be taken in such a way that there can be no complaint about its fairness. I believe that the grossest injustice was done in the taking of the last census. I do not believe that a fair census was taken in 1870, 1880, or 1890; and I have given the best attention I could to the matter. It may be that men occupying responsible positions were not to blame for this, but I think they were. In many instances the most incompetent men were selected as enumerators, and those men were selected more from partisan considerations than from any sense of public good.

Now, if this be true, it ought to be corrected in the pending bill. There ought not to be another enactment which will permit the same sort of things to be done and under which the same complaints can come up.

Mr. HALE. I do not suppose the Senator from Arkansas, whatever may be his general view about the scope and wisdom of the civil-service rules, thinks the enumerators could be selected by any process of that kind. They work for only a month; their range is very limited, and it would practically arrest and hang up the whole work if they had to be submitted to an examination under the regular civil-service rules.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. If the Senator will permit me, I have not made any argument or attempted to make any argument in favor of having that class of people put under the civil service. What I insist on is that this bill shall be so constructed that it will be fairly administered; that honest and competent men shall be selected. I believe they can be selected in every enumerator's district in the United States, and that men shall not and can not be selected who are notoriously incompetent and are simply selected for the purpose of giving them political advantage.

Mr. HALE. My observation about that census was that generally the work was well done and done in an honorable way; done, so far as the enumerators were concerned, as well as it could be. I think there were undoubtedly some portions of the country where perhaps offensive men were put at the work, but I do not think it resulted in any great evil. They did the best they could. It was short work, soon over and done with and forgotten.

I agree with the Senator from Arkansas that when the work is to be done, whoever has charge of it, the enumerators, when they are selected, should be selected with care; that they ought to be men who have the confidence of the neighborhoods where they work. They go right into people's houses, and an offensive man becomes doubly offensive when he does that. I agree with the Senator that, whoever does it, the selection of those men should be very carefully made. I will join hands with the Senator when the time comes, but that work really is not considered at all in the pending bill. It is not intended to be.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. But the machinery provided for by this bill will have charge of exactly that class of work, and unless there be some provision made to check its being used for partisan purposes it seems to me we will have a repetition of the troubles which we had before.

In looking at the bill I confess that I am at a loss to know just what ought to be done. I have no desire to find fault for the purpose of finding fault. I should like to see machinery adopted for the taking of a census that will command the confidence of the people of the country everywhere. For instance, you provide for a director of the census and an assistant director.

Instead of having both of those men belong to one political party, if there were a provision that they should belong to opposite political parties, then I imagine there would be no bald-faced effort to carry out partisan purpose, inasmuch as there would be some check or restraint because of a man of opposite politics having access to the files and letters and arguments presented in support of such a movement.

I scarcely know what to suggest; but, for the purpose of testing the sense of the Senate, I move, in line 6 on page 2 of the bill, after the words "an assistant director of the census," to insert the words "who shall not belong to the same political party as the director of the census;" so that it will read.

There shall be an assistant director of the census, who shall not belong to the same political party as the director of the census.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair suggests to the Senator from Arkansas that an amendment of the committee is already pending, with an amendment to the amendment. The Chair will later recognize the Senator from Arkansas for the purpose of proposing the amendment.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I will withhold the amendment, then, until such time as it is in order.

I should be glad if the bill could go over until the Senator from Indiana or the Senator from California or the Senator from Louisiana is here. It seems to me it is too important a measure and involves too much to be hastily carried through. I should like to have the bill carefully considered and a measure passed that will give satisfaction to both sides of the Chamber.

Mr. CARTER. Referring to the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas to the effect that the Democratic members of the committee should be present during the consideration of the bill, I wish to state that no possible discourtesy to the Democratic members of the committee can be implied, for the reason that every member of the committee without exception favored the bill as reported.

The amendment offered this morning to leave the rules pertaining to examinations subject to the approval of the President rather than the Secretary of the Interior was suggested for the purpose of keeping the bill harmonious with the original idea upon which it was framed. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE], the ranking Democratic member of the committee, carefully considered each and every part and portion of the bill as reported, and was most cordial and unreserved in his approval of its terms. The bill in itself, as suggested on a former occasion, merely provides for the initiation of the work, without committing Congress in any substantial manner to any particular line of policy with reference to the taking of the census.

As suggested wisely by the Senator from Arkansas, this is a very important question, and there are many details connected with it—details difficult to anticipate in the course of a discussion on the floor of the Senate. Realizing this, the committee provided for this piece of preliminary legislation looking to the presentation of a plan, with the reasons for the details of the plan as presented to be submitted at a later date through the committee, and a bill in conformity with that plan to be then offered for the consideration of Congress. If this preliminary bill shall not be passed in due season to allow the presentation of the plans so that the present Congress can act upon them, then we will have the great difficulty to encounter which was met in 1890, of the organization of a census bureau almost immediately upon the date when the work of taking the census was to be actively commenced.

It is conceded on all hands that the taking of the last census was made more expensive by reason of the fact that the bureau was not organized in due season to allow reasonable preparation for the commencement of the work. Many of the difficulties connected with the selection of enumerators—and some difficulty was encountered in almost every Congressional district in the country on that point—were largely attributable to the fact that the Superintendent of the Census found himself lacking in the matter of time to give due consideration to the selection of proper persons in the various sections of the country to perform this work.

The purpose of this initiatory step, this preliminary bill, is to get before the Congress, prior to its adjournment at the present session, in ample time to permit the fullest and freest consideration of the details, the plan upon which the census shall be taken. Each and every day that the passage of this preliminary bill is delayed delays the presentation of the plan and limits the time for its consideration.

The force to be selected is limited by the terms of the bill itself to thirty-two persons. The nature of the work is obviously temporary, but it is declared to be temporary by the bill as well. No one accepting employment under the terms of the preliminary bill can for one moment assume that such employment is to be made permanent when by the terms of the law under which the employment obtains the work is but temporary.

It is believed by the committee that this plan can be presented, if the pending bill shall be passed within a reasonable time, so that the measure providing for the taking of a census may be submitted for consideration here not later than the 1st day of March. If presented at that time, there will be ample season for full consideration. The manner of taking the census, provisions for nonpartisan work in the course of the enumerations, may all be fully and fairly considered. This bill makes no provision at all for these details, and makes no pretense of any provision.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana why we should establish a permanent census bureau, what reason there is for it?

Mr. CARTER. In the first place, the work of taking each successive census requires the performance of certain work de novo, which has been performed repeatedly by the directors or superintendents of census bureaus through all the decades that have preceded.

Mr. ALLEN. Would that be true if, in the first instance, you selected competent persons to perform the work?

Mr. CARTER. The difficulty rests not in the character of the persons selected, but in the fact that their employment by the Government is necessarily temporary. There is no continuous existence to the census work.

Mr. ALLEN. There ought not to be.

Mr. CARTER. For instance, all that remains of the last census consists of a single civil-service clerk, now detailed to address envelopes down in one of the rented buildings in the District of Columbia.

Mr. ALLEN. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Montana, however, to the fact that there was an army of clerks within the last two or three years doing some work upon the Eleventh Census, and I was just about to ask the Senator from Montana if he thinks we shall get through with the Eleventh Census in time to begin the Twelfth in 1900?

Mr. CARTER. I doubt it very much. I understand that one volume of the reports will probably not be printed at all.

Mr. ALLEN. Which one volume of the Eleventh Census reports will not be printed?

Mr. COCKRELL. Four volumes pertaining to vital statistics and one volume on agriculture and fisheries have not been furnished to our document room.

Mr. CARTER. That is true.

Mr. COCKRELL. And the statistical atlas has not been printed.

Mr. CARTER. That is correct.

Mr. COCKRELL. I see very little occasion for printing the volume on agriculture and fisheries when they already have one volume that practically includes it. There is no necessity for duplicating it.

Mr. CARTER. This unfortunate condition of affairs leads to the inquiry, how can the recurrence of the misfortune be prevented? The census business ceased to be anybody's business when the Superintendent ceased to have authority or to continue as an employee of the Government in charge.

Mr. ALLEN. Let me ask the Senator from Montana a very plain and possibly a very blunt question. Is there not a constant disposition on the part of those having charge of the census to spin out the work over an indefinite number of years and continue their salaries?

Mr. HALE. Unless the Senator from Montana desires himself to reply, will he allow me to answer the question?

Mr. CARTER. With pleasure.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Montana allows me to answer the question.

One of the things that the present Committee on the Census is trying to do is first to initiate this work and then to have a plan reported to Congress that shall be rid of these great delays which have encumbered the previous census work.

As I have said, I went through that and suffered considerably in the experience at seeing the work drag out, so that it is true some of the results of the work of the census, now 1898, two years from the time when we are to take another, have not been published, and therefore are of little or no use.

The underlying reason was that the census was made too large in its scope. Instead of being a census such as the Senator from Nebraska, I presume, desires, and as I desire, it was amplified and became a work of preparing and printing immense essays, scientific papers, semiscientific papers, philosophic papers, and all that, which are agreeable to a few men, but which do not reach the public wants, and which prolonged the work of the census, made it expensive, made it of long duration, until at last it became a nuisance.

Now, this year, and I am in favor of it (we do not consider that in the pending bill), the plan will be presented to us from this temporary force, and we will have to take it and put it into shape in the committees and report it to Congress, and then we shall have to consider all the questions raised by the Senator from Arkansas as to the kind of employees and the great delays that have encumbered other censuses. We shall have to consider them when that bill comes up. I shall be in favor then, from my experience, of cutting it down, limiting its scope, so that it shall be a real census and nothing else, cheaper by far than the others, and it ought to be all ended and the results submitted to the public within a year and a half or two years from the time the work is undertaken.

It will be a difficult matter. I say to the Senator that the things which perplex him perplex me a great deal more than they do him, because I had some of the responsibility. I was mortified to see the work continued along, and I dreaded to have a Senator rise and ask me when the old census work would be completed. I was not able, with the design of that census and the way it was run, to bring the work to an end sooner than it was. I regret it very much.

Mr. ALLEN. Am I to understand that a portion of the work of the Eleventh Census is to pass over into the next census decade?

Mr. HALE. No; the work is done. As the Senator from Montana says, there is a single clerk detailed to answer letters and address envelopes.

Mr. ALLEN. But, if the Senator will permit me, of what earthly benefit will statistics gathered in 1890 be to the people in 1900?

Mr. HALE. As I have said, very little.

Mr. ALLEN. If we can not have the statistics within a few months after they are gathered, they are of no earthly account to the American people.

Mr. HALE. As I tried to explain, the committee now intend, when we reach that, to have a work that will be completed and will be presented to the public, not as the old censuses have been, but within eighteen months or two years from the time the work is done—the whole thing. Otherwise it is of very little value.

Mr. SPOONER. Would it not be of some use for purposes of comparison?

Mr. HALE. A great deal of the work is not of very much use for comparison, because it is not sought for or read or seen by one man in a thousand.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator from Maine permit me? I was prompted to make this interruption of the remarks of the Senator from Montana because of the apparent disposition in every branch of this Government, whether it is permanent or temporary, to make the largest possible charge against the Treasury and to take the largest conceivable sum from the Treasury.

Here is a branch of the public service, the gathering and compiling of statistical matter of the census of 1890, which in all reason and justice ought to have been completed within two or three years, at least by 1893. There were an army of clerks, numbering a great many, I will not undertake to say how many, an army of cormorants, if I may so call them, consuming the money of the United States, pretending to render some service in the Census Bureau, until within a year or two ago, when, I suppose, they had eaten up the appropriation practically, and then by force of circumstances they were compelled to march out.

Mr. HALE. There has been a very small clerical force.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator from Maine will indulge me right here, I was going to say that I was prompted to make this suggestion by the additional fact that I have been informed that from the $100,000 we voted here a little over a year ago to arm and equip a commission to inquire into the true boundary line between Venezuela and British Guiana, notwithstanding the commission is functus officio and has done nothing and has never reported to anybody, it has quarters in this city, it has clerks whose only occupation is to draw salaries, and I suppose it will continue until the $100,000 is gone.

Mr. HALE. There has been a very small clerical force employed within the last three or four years. It has been exceedingly limited. There are now, as the records just sent me show, two volumes, part 1 of Vital Statistics and the Statistical Atlas, not complete. All the rest are completed and ready for distribution. This is the list.

Mr. COCKRELL. But they have not been published.

Mr. HALE. The others are ready for distribution.

Mr. COCKRELL. I beg pardon. The Senator is certainly mistaken about the other volumes being received from the Public Printer and ready for distribution.

Mr. HALE. I do not know whether they have been received from the Public Printer.

Mr. COCKRELL. I know they have not been, because I have been trying to get them for a week or ten days.

Mr. HALE. All of those have been completed.

Mr. COCKRELL. Not one single volume of the four parts of vital statistics has been printed for distribution. The Statistical Atlas has not been, and the other volume, on agriculture and fisheries, has not been printed either. There is one volume on agriculture, irrigation, and fisheries which I take it includes all that there is in the volume on agriculture and fisheries, and that has been published and is ready for distribution, but the other five volumes have not been and neither has the statistical atlas.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Maine alluded to the fact that he has had some connection with this question. I suppose that will justify me in saying that as an officer I have had some connection with it.

Mr. HALE. Yes; the Senator had charge of it while at the head of the Interior Department.

Mr. TELLER. Heretofore the census has been taken under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, and while I did not have anything to do with the early work in connection with the census of 1880, the closing up of it fell under my control. I know some of the difficulties which we encounter in this work. In the first place, a nation like ours requires a very expensive census report if we are to have any at all. I do not know that we have enlarged it too much. The census of 1880 cost, I think, somewhere in the neighborhood of $10,000,000. The census of 1890 cost between ten and twelve million dollars.

Mr. HALE. Fully $12,000,000.

Mr. TELLER. It cost fully $12,000,000, the Senator from Maine says. We will inevitably increase the amount. It is impossible to take the census of 75,000,000 people that we will take in 1900 without a tremendous expense, and unless we take a census that will be not only expensive but tedious, and with great delay, it will be of no particular value to us.

The main things that are taken in a census and the most valuable things in a census, aside from the bare question of population, are the statistics of our wealth and of our poverty or debts and what we call vital statistics. The important question to be early determined and reported is that of population, and that has always been done pretty promptly, I think. The other questions are for comparative purposes, and it makes but little difference whether the figures are used as to the census of 1880 or 1890, except as we compare to see what has been the change from one census to another, and for those purposes there is not such a great necessity for prompt action.

I do not believe it will be possible for the Senator from Maine or the committee, with the force that is here to be selected and established, to get a complete disposition of all the questions by two or three years after the census is reported. Delay is inevitable. If we undertake to determine these questions there must be great expense and great delay.

Mr. President, I am a firm believer in the necessity of a bureau for the purpose of taking the census. As was stated by the Senator from Montana, there is not any question but that we have lost in every census we have taken owing to the fact that we did not have a system established and laid out beforehand. I recommended while I was Secretary of the Interior, and tried then to have established, a bureau or a division in some of the Departments where this could be done. The pending bill contemplates the appointment, in the first place, of a director and assistant director, who are not to be responsible to any Department now existing. In my judgment, this business should be conducted either under one of the existing Departments or that quasi department, the Labor Bureau. I do not know whether it is called a department of late or not. It is now the Labor Department, I understand.

Mr. ALLISON. The Department of Labor.

Mr. TELLER. I am opposed to the creation of so many departments. The departments grow in number, and next there will be a demand that every head of a department shall be a member of the Cabinet. There is now a movement in the country that we shall add a department of commerce, whose head shall be a Cabinet officer.

Mr. GALLINGER. And a medical department.

Mr. TELLER. Yes; a medical department, and a mining department.

Mr. GALLINGER. And a scientific department.

Mr. TELLER. And a scientific department. Mr. President, we can not create departments of this kind and increase the Cabinet to an unlimited extent. No benefit will be derived from it. There ought not to be another department created. As the Labor Bureau is in existence, whether it is a department or a bureau, that is the proper place. The Census Office ought to be a bureau under some Department, and the Department of Labor is the proper place for this work.

The creation of a census is a statistical work. It requires peculiar talent and peculiar information on the part of those who take it in charge. It is not an executive department in the sense that the other Departments are executive. It deals with facts. It does not create anything; it does not suggest anything; but it deals with existing facts, and it is established for the purpose of determining and reporting to the Government what are the facts in certain lines. It ought to be, so to speak, a cold-blooded establishment.

There ought not to be any partisanship in it. It ought not to be a department that is dependent upon the advent of one political organization or another. Statistics ought always to be exact. They are worth nothing unless they are truthful. It is the very essence of the value of statistics that they are accurate and correct. You will not get that accuracy if we do not throw around this department the safeguard that we have thrown around the other Departments of the Government in the selection of the men who administer it.

I do not say that the director or the assistant ought to go through a civil-service examination. I should expect them to be selected in the methods ordinarily followed, by the party in power; but I do say that when they are selected, if appointed with reference to their qualification and ability in that line, it ought to be thoroughly understood that they shall remain, and that a change of Administration will not mean a change in the statistical department of the Government, as it has done heretofore.

Mr. President, we have published more statistics than any other nation in the world. We have more statistics, not because we have more people than any other nation in the world, but we have more than any nation that does anything in the line of statistics amounting to anything. Our statistical work has been considered of value, and the farther you get away from the United States the more valuable they are; that is, we know here that many of them are not valuable at all. The Treasury Department will issue one set of statistics from one of its bureaus, and then again we have another set from another bureau, and no man can make the two agree. The Statistical Bureau, which is a branch of the Treasury Department, will issue its Statistical Abstracts, none of them agreeing with the statistical statements of other bureaus. The Census Bureau ought to be a bureau not only for the census, but for all the statistical information that we give out to the public. It could be made a bureau of permanence, and that ought to be done.

Mr. HALE. I think something of that kind was in the mind of the projectors of the scheme for what was called a permanent census board. It was to meet just the evil the Senator from Colorado is describing, and to gather into it as much as possible all the getting of statistics so as to prepare the work for the decennial census, when it comes, that we might have something authoritative. That was the idea which has been brought out in certain reports by committees of Congress on the subject.

Mr. TELLER. With that idea I am in full sympathy. I know myself that that would expedite and I believe cheapen eventually the census.

There is one thing I am particularly anxious about, and that is that it shall not be a partisan bureau. I am anxious that it shall be a bureau that all classes of people may look to with confidence that it reports the truth. I dislike to say it, but I will repeat here what I have stated in private again and again. I could convict before a jury, if it should be necessary, one Department of this Government for having falsified the returns intentionally upon the financial question. I can prove that the returns from Mexico as to silver were manufactured in the Treasury Department at one time, not under the present régime, where $10,000,000 was added without a particle of evidence for the purpose of swelling the amount that Mexico had produced, so as to carry out a particular idea that the officer in charge of that bureau had in his mind, to make out that the world's production of silver was larger than it ought to have been.

Mr. President, statistics so manufactured are absolutely worthless, and that will be done when you have a partisan who thinks that it is his duty to carry out a particular principle or policy of the party he is serving. We have not had from the Treasury Department for the last few years a report on the manufacture of coin that is not a misleading and falsifying statement of the facts touching the money of the world. If you intend to do honest, decent work, you must get rid of partisan effort. If there is a single bureau anywhere that ought to be put under the control of the civil-service law, it is this one. Now, this may be temporary——

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. As I understand the Senator, he thinks the Census Bureau should be a permanent bureau.

Mr. TELLER. I do. That is what the bill provides for.

Mr. SPOONER. It looks so to me, and the question I was about to put to the Senator is whether the bill does not provide for it permanently?

Mr. TELLER. It does.

Mr. COCKRELL. It does not place it under any great Department or branch of the Government.

Mr. SPOONER. That is true, but it says "there shall be at the seat of Government a census office the duties of which shall be the taking of the Twelfth and succeeding censuses and the collection of other information, as hereinafter provided."

Mr. TELLER. Oh, yes; the bill is all right in that particular.

Mr. HALE. That is one of the objects of the bill.

Mr. TELLER. It is one of the objects of the bill. It is one of the merits of the bill. I agree to that. I am in favor of it.

The bill provides that a director shall be appointed at a salary of $5,000 a year. That is not too much. A man fit to be director, who enters into that work and expects to stay there, should be a technical, scholarly man, acquainted with statistics, and competent not only to manage the statistical department, but to some extent he must have executive ability also to control the great force he must have for a time at least. Then an assistant director is to be appointed with a salary of $4,000. Then a chief clerk with a salary of $2,500. To that point, I agree, the President of the United States ought to be left to make the selections without any civil-service law. I believe he can do it better without being trammeled.

Now we come down to the technical work. There is to be a chief clerk at $2,500 a year, and there are to be five statisticians at an annual salary of $3,000. Those are the men who ought to go before a board of statistical experts. No man ought to take one of those places at $3,000 a year who can not pass a critical examination in one of the schools of technology. If this bill passes, and there is no supervision over those appointments, they will be appointed because of their political connections and their partisan affiliations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado will suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 112) to amend the immigration laws of the United States.

Mr. LODGE. I do not desire to go on with the bill at this time.

Mr. CARTER. I ask that the unfinished business be laid aside.

Mr. LODGE. Let it be laid aside informally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the unfinished business will be laid aside informally. The Senator from Colorado will proceed.

Mr. TELLER. I have no doubt the director of the census will be selected because he is also a partisan, but I am morally certain that when the President of the United States comes to select such an officer he will select him for his qualifications as well. If he can find men in his own political organization who are qualified for the work of a director and assistant director, I have no objection to his preferring those to any others. But when you come to the statisticians, who are to be left there, who, if the permanent bureau is to be of any value, must remain there permanently for many years, they ought not to be selected for political reasons, and I am not willing to trust the director of the census to do what I am willing to trust the Executive of the nation to do.

Then take the other force. I will admit that this is a temporary affair. It ought not to be a temporary affair. There is no reason why this bureau should not be established permanently now, and the force established now, and with permanency.

Mr. COCKRELL. Where does the Senator find anything in the bill to indicate that it is a temporary affair?

Mr. TELLER. There is to be a temporary force, I say.

Mr. COCKRELL. What part of it is to be a temporary force?

Mr. TELLER. Not the statisticians; they are not temporary. But when you have disposed of the director, the assistant director, the chief clerk, the five statisticians, and the stenographer, you come to what is called a temporary force.

Mr. COCKRELL. Not exceeding thirty-two.

Mr. TELLER. Yes; not exceeding a certain number.

Mr. COCKRELL. But all those who mold the machinery will be partisans, and the other thirty-two will simply have to work under their direction.

Mr. TELLER. It ought not to be a temporary force at all. If you are to create a bureau or a department of this character, why should you have a temporary force? It is done for the purpose of escaping the civil-service law. We might just as well be frank about it. It is to enable the new Secretary to make his selections from the partisans of the country and not from the experts of the country.

Mr. CARTER. Will the Senator permit me a moment in reply to his interrogatory?

Mr. TELLER. I will.

Mr. CARTER. It is unquestionably intended by the bill that the director of the census provided for shall direct the taking of the census in 1900. It is contemplated with equal precision that the statisticians selected shall continue. However, the first work to be performed by the director and his assistant and the statisticians will consist in the preparation of the plan, the skeleton, the details, and all the necessary information upon which Congress may proceed intelligently to legislate for that census. In the preparation of this plan it was contemplated by the committee that the director, his assistant, and the statisticians might need the services of certain clerks and messengers and watchmen to run the building and charwomen to clean up the floor, and the force thus to be employed for their convenience, not in connection with the regular census work, because that is not provided for, but in connection with this temporary work, should be a temporary force. It is not to be considered as at all connected with the permanent work of the census.

Mr. TELLER. I understood it quite as well before the Senator made that statement as since. I was contending that that was one of the vices of the bill, and that the vice was inserted for the purpose of making it possible to fill those appointments without the civil service. I think the Committee on the Census would hardly come here and suggest that they would establish a permanent bureau or a permanent department and that the officers who were there permanently should not be within the civil service. But they will not be within the civil service unless the President puts them there. Everybody connected with the bureau except those who are now excepted from the civil service, like the charwomen and messengers and watchmen, etc., and I understand they are not now excepted——

Mr. GALLINGER. Messengers and watchmen are under the civil service, according to the President's order.

Mr. TELLER. It is a great humbug to put watchmen and messengers and that class of employees under the civil service.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is what I think, but they are there.

Mr. TELLER. I am free to say that while I am in favor of the civil-service law as applied to a certain class of employees, it is a farce to put another class of employees under the civil-service law; and it has been done only for the purpose of keeping men in place who are in. That is all there is of that.

Mr. President, I am not willing to assist in carrying out any such further schemes of prostituting the civil-service business as has been done heretofore for the purpose of getting men in without the civil-service law and then keeping them in with the civil-service law.

But I say that these statisticians of all others should be within the civil-service law. I care infinitely more about those than about clerks of classes Nos. 1, 2, 3, or 4. But if clerks of classes Nos. 1, 2, 3, or 4 in the Land Office, in the Pension Office, in the Treasury Department, and everywhere else must get into office under the civil-service law, these men ought to go in under it. There will then be an opportunity for them to remain in office; and if they are valuable men, they should remain in office, and they should not be considered a temporary force, but a permanent force, subject always, of course, to the right of the head of the bureau or department to drop them out for inefficiency or if he should not need them.

Mr. President, I am not as much devoted to the civil service as some people in this country. I voted for the civil-service law, and I believe the civil-service law properly carried out is a very wise measure. I think it has been badly abused, and I think the abuse of it has had a tendency to bring it into disrepute and to weaken its force and value. But yet the time has come when we must have in this country a civil-service system. We can not avoid it. The Republican party stand pledged to it. I do not care what may be said in another branch or somewhere else about it, the Republican party declared that they were for its enforcement and that it was to be extended to every branch of the Government where it was practicable. I found it stated in one of the reports of the platform that it should be extended to every place possible. I prefer to think that perhaps they said "practicable" instead of "possible."

Mr. President, if we are going to maintain the civil-service law at all when applied to this class of appointees, there is no reason why we should not apply it to this force also. I repeat, it seems to me it is absolutely indispensable to a good selection of these statistical officers that they should be selected in some way so as to secure a nonpartisan and a competent force, and a force of that character certainly ought to be permanent, as I think the Senator from Montana will admit.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, on the incidental subject which was touched upon as to the progress of the work of the census of 1890, I find that the circular sent out from the Department of the Interior December 7 is correct as to the condition of the volumes. They are all printed and ready for distribution except part 1 of Vital Statistics and the Statistical Atlas. The Secretary in sending out this circular says, speaking of all the others, some of which were referred to by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] as not being printed:

> These volumes will be mailed to persons whose names and address you may at your convenience submit to the Department with the information that they are sent at your request, provided its records do not show that they have already been supplied, in which event you will be notified.

So, with those exceptions, that work is completed and the volumes may be distributed.

I suggest to the Senator from Montana in charge of the bill that perhaps with the thin Senate, and with the desire some Senators have that the bill shall go over, he may not wish to take a vote to-day, and that we might go into executive session, as a large number of nominations have come in from the President. I leave it to his discretion.

Mr. CARTER. I suggest that the bill be allowed to go over until to-morrow, if no other Senators desire to be heard at this time.

Mr. ALLISON. Before the bill goes over, I suggest that it be reprinted with the amendments now proposed, as I understand, by the committee.

I wish to say before the matter passes that I am opposed to and shall vote against the establishment of an independent department for the census. In my judgment it should be attached to some one of the Departments of the Government. I wish to address myself at the proper time to that question.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Montana if the pending bill provides for what has been described as a "permanent census bureau?" I do not think that its language is clear. The title of the bill is in practically the same phraseology as the bill touching the Eleventh Census. That bill was also described as "a bill to provide for the Eleventh and subsequent censuses." If you will follow this bill through its several sections, I do not see that there is any language which necessarily provides for a permanent census bureau. There is, however, some equivocal language which looks in that direction. For instance, near the end of section 6 it is said that the director of the census—in his report he shall make such further suggestions and recommendations relating to the details necessary for taking the Twelfth and subsequent censuses and for the continuous work of a permanent census office as he may deem proper.

Speaking for myself, I can say that I think it proper that there should be an early preliminary organization of the Census Office, so that the next census may be taken in a speedy, systematic, and economical manner; but it has never seemed to me desirable that there should be a formal permanent census bureau. I think if such an office were established, it would soon go the same road that has been traveled by every other bureau since the foundation of the Government. As time went on new subjects for the administration of the bureau would be constantly recommended and entered upon, and we would soon find the original plan overloaded and expanded beyond the wildest conceptions of its designers.

Perhaps every census which has been taken in the United States has been a disappointment to those who planned it. By comparing the eleven censuses we have had in the United States you will find not only a progressive increase in the cost of each census, but an increase in the cost per capita. There is no good reason why there should be a continual growth in the per capita cost of a national census.

It will also be found that every forecast of results by those who have prepared census bills in the past twenty years has been disappointed.

One of the chief actors in the preparation of the last census bill—the one under which the Eleventh Census was taken—was the distinguished Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], who is now a member of this body; yet, sir, if you will examine the speeches which he made when that bill was pending before the Senate, you will find the most halcyon predictions in regard to the time within which that census would be completed and the probable number of volumes which would be published in illustration of its achievements.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. CHILTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. I have already said—I suppose the Senator was not here, or, if here, was perhaps not listening—that it was a source of discomfort to me that all the expectations which we had of that work being done speedily and the bureau reporting its results to the public in two or three years came to naught, and the predictions that were made by myself and others and that the Superintendent held out were not answered by the results. It took a great deal longer, it cost more money, and it dragged in every way beyond any expectation. That is one reason why we are trying, and shall try in the next census, to see if we can not get the work done promptly.

Mr. CHILTON. I hope we shall have better success than accompanied the work of the Tenth and Eleventh censuses, because each of those censuses has been disappointing to earnest friends of efficient census work. As I remember, the Senator from Maine was not only hopeful in 1889 that the work of the Eleventh Census would be completed in two or three years, but he thought that it could be put in print in seven or eight volumes. In that respect, too, the work of the Eleventh Census has been a great disappointment to the friends of correct census work.

Sir, I join with the Senator from Maine in the hope that the census force which is provided for in this bill will be able to devise a scheme by which the Twelfth Census can be limited within reasonable proportions, avoiding both the elaborate essays which are to be found in the Tenth Census publications and the unnecessary investigations which were made under the Eleventh Census.

It is fair to say that all the expense connected with the taking of the Eleventh Census was not due to the Superintendent of that census. After he had outlined the work which was to be done, Congress itself added new and independent subjects of inquiry.

Mr. HALE. Very greatly.

Mr. CHILTON. And in that way a very large loss of time and a considerable loss of money ensued. For instance, if you will go now and look into the records of the Eleventh Census, you will find a list of all the surviving soldiers of the last war. This was collected at very great expense; it was totally unnecessary; and, happily, it has never been printed. Then, too, after the Superintendent of the last census had prepared blanks to be used by the enumerators, Congress, by adding new subjects of inquiry, made it necessary to throw aside a large mass of blanks already printed.

It is to be hoped that when we have a director of the next census, and when he makes his recommendations, they will be fully debated and acted upon by Congress, and that after that there will be no change in the arrangement for the taking of that census.

The truth is, American census work has grown too diffuse. The First Census was printed in one volume, and up to 1860 there had never been more than four volumes of the publications of any one census. After the war we entered upon the census work on a scale which is absolutely astounding in its reach.

I realize that we shall never get back to the old method of enumerating the population strictly, or anything like it, though for myself I believe that the founders of our Republic designed an enumeration of the population for a specific constitutional purpose, namely, the apportionment of representation among the several States. But a construction of the Constitution built up by long process of time is hard to overturn, and, dealing with practical conditions, I recognize the fact that we shall never get back to the census system which prevailed in the earlier times of this Republic.

It might be a fortunate thing if we could get back to it. I have no doubt we shall have the next census on the modern plan. But I do hope that the Senator from Maine, a member of the majority party upon this floor, and especially the majority party which controls the other House and which is represented in the Presidential office, will address himself with vigor and with system to the work of reducing the dimensions of the next census. It was almost a scandal, sir, to print as many volumes as are to be found in the publications of the Tenth and Eleventh Censuses. A great deal of that work is useless, and it ought not to be repeated in a new census.

The Senator from Maine, when he was debating the preliminaries of the Eleventh Census, remarked with telling force that it was only necessary once in a hundred years to have such a census as that which was taken in 1880; and yet we find that the census which he then predicted would be an improvement on former undertakings of the same sort has almost doubled in expense the very census which he condemned upon that occasion. We ought to have no more such censuses.

So far as the question of civil service is concerned, it seems to me that if there is one single bureau in all the bureaus of this great Government which ought to be governed by true civil-service regulation, it is the bureau having charge of the census work. One has only to look back to the investigations which were set on foot in Congress and at the numberless newspaper accusations which where set afloat in this country to see how much partisanship was thought to have been employed in the machinery of the Eleventh Census.

On one occasion a Senator from Missouri read a letter here which had been issued by some man connected with the census work in Missouri, asking certain of the enumerators to take a political poll of the voters in their districts while doing the census work.

I do not charge that the Superintendent of the Census was a party to any of the political manipulations which were alleged to have grown out of the taking of the last census, but, remembering the opportunities which exist to misuse the Census Office for political purposes, it seems to me there ought to be no room left for suspicion in this particular field.

Mr. President, I have said more upon this question than I intended. I understand that on the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas, reenforced by the suggestion of the Senator from Maine, this bill will pass over until the Senators representing the minority upon the Census Committee are here. At this time I want to ask the Senator from Montana for an explicit statement whether, in his judgment, this bill provides for a permanent census bureau or whether it merely provides for a bureau such as was organized under the other census bills?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the natural operation of the law would result, I think, in the establishment of a permanent census bureau.

I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. COCKRELL. One moment. I do not think there can be any earthly question that it is proposed to establish a permanent census bureau when this bill says:

That there shall be at the seat of Government a census office, the duties of which shall be the taking of the Twelfth and succeeding censuses and the collection of other information, as hereinafter provided.

Mr. CARTER. I think that is correct.

Mr. COCKRELL. If that does not make it permanent, I do not know what would.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Montana to submit an order for reprinting the bill with the amendments.

Mr. COCKRELL. I wish to make a correction. In the remarks I made about the publication of certain census reports, I referred to the reports as never having been received in the Senate document room, where I supposed they would go in the first place. They have not been received there; but I learn that they have been bound and are in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior for distribution.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I wish to have a clear understanding relative to the request presented by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], to the effect that all pending amendments to the census bill be printed. That, I believe, includes one amendment proposed by the committee, section 3; likewise an amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES], to be inserted in line 6, after the word "census," on page 2.

Mr. GRAY. To what section?

Mr. TELLER. Section 2.

Mr. CARTER. In section 2, to the effect that the assistant director should not be of the same political party as the director.

Mr. ALLISON. I will suggest to the Senator from Montana that the amendments of the committee be printed in the text of the bill, and that other amendments be printed at the end of the bill, with such descriptive words as will show where they are to be inserted. I want myself to see what the committee finally propose respecting this entire matter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, that will be the order.

Mr. WALTHALL. If the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] will withdraw his motion for an executive session for a few minutes, I wish to present some papers to the Senate and ask for an order with reference to them. It is a matter of some importance.

Mr. CARTER. I withdraw the motion for that purpose.

QUARANTINE STATION AT SHIP ISLAND, MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. WALTHALL. I desire to call up resolution 192, offered by me early in the session and now lying on the table, so that I may have an order made with reference to it. The resolution has already been read to the Senate. It provides that the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine shall be directed to investigate and report whether it be not advisable that the quarantine station at Ship Island, Mississippi, be removed to some other point in the Gulf a little more remote from the mainland.

I ask that that resolution may be referred to that committee along with a number of papers which I now present. These papers are:

First, a copy of the act of March 5, 1888, under which the quarantine station was removed from Ship Island to Chandeleur Island, and a communication containing the following matters: The substance of the proceedings in Congress when this measure was under consideration, showing that the act was prayed for by the county authorities of Harrison County, Miss., recommended by the then Supervising Surgeon-General of the Marine-Hospital Service, and passed because such removal was deemed necessary to the health and safety of the people on the mainland; an extract from the present Supervising Surgeon-General's report of 1893, showing that the quarantine station was moved back to Ship Island in October, 1893, and stating the circumstances under which he took that responsibility; and an extract from the appropriation bill approved August 18, 1894, referring to such quarantine station as "transferred from Chandeleur Island."

Second. Extracts from the annual reports of the Supervising Surgeon-General of the Marine-Hospital Service for 1886 and 1887, recommending the removal of the quarantine station from Ship Island.

Third. Report of Dr. H. H. Haralson, quarantine inspector at the port of Biloxi, to the State board of health of Mississippi, dated October 1, 1896, in relation to the Ship Island quarantine and proceedings of the State board thereon, in which the governor of the State is earnestly requested to use his influence to secure the removal of the station from Ship Island.

Fourth. The report of the State board of health to the governor of Mississippi, covering the period between March 24, 1896, and September 30, 1897, in which the Ship Island quarantine is discussed and reasons stated why it should be removed, and containing a copy of a letter from the governor to the Secretary of the Treasury asking for its removal.

Fifth. A letter from Dr. Haralson, of the Mississippi State board of health, dated November 26, 1897, contending that the Ship Island quarantine is responsible for the introduction of yellow fever in 1897; a statement from Dr. J. F. Hunter, secretary of the board, published September 8, 1897, that this quarantine is prejudicial to the public health, giving the reasons for this opinion; and a letter from Surgeon-General Wyman, transmitting one from Surg. R. D. Murray, of the Marine-Hospital Service, combating these views.

Sixth. Resolutions of the board of supervisors of Jackson County, Miss., and of the board of aldermen of Biloxi, Miss., favoring the removal of the Ship Island Quarantine Station, the one to Petit Bois Island and the other to Chandeleur Island; and the proceedings of two meetings of citizens of Biloxi, the one favoring and the other opposing any removal.

Seventh. Comments of the Biloxi (Miss.) Herald, the New Orleans Picayune, the New Orleans Times-Democrat, and other newspapers, showing that the proposed investigation should be made without delay.

Mr. President, the matter involved in this proposed investigation is one of extreme importance to the people of the Gulf Coast and the South Atlantic Coast. If, as has been repeatedly alleged, the Ship Island quarantine station is dangerous to the health and safety of those people, it should be removed at once; and if it is not, that fact should be ascertained and made public, so that all anxiety on the subject may be put at rest.

I trust that this resolution, or some other resolution looking to the same end, may be promptly reported by the committee and passed by the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the reference requested by the Senator from Mississippi of the papers referred to by him to the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine? The Chair hears none, and they will be so referred.

THE CIVIL SERVICE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of State, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

The Secretary of State, to whom was addressed the resolution of the Senate of December 18, 1897, reading as follows—

"Resolved, That the heads of the several Executive Departments, respectively, be directed to inform the Senate what appointive positions, if any, in their respective Departments should, in their opinion, be excepted from the operation of the laws governing the civil service or the rules established by the Civil Service Commission; and further,

"Resolved, That the said heads of the several Executive Departments, respectively, be directed to inform the Senate what changes or amendments to the present civil-service rules seem to be desirable, as indicated by their experience"— has the honor to make report so far as concerns the Department of State.

I found upon entering upon my duties as Secretary of State that the entire clerical force of the Department, including the chief clerk, at $2,500, and six chiefs of bureau, at $2,100 each, was covered by the civil-service law under a Presidential order extending its operations so as to embrace those officers.

My opinion is that these seven positions should "be excepted from the operations of the laws governing the civil service, or the rules established by the Civil Service Commission," and I so recommend, should any changes or amendments to the present civil-service law or rules be contemplated. These officers should be either appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, or the Secretary of State should be, as formerly, acting for the President, empowered to appoint them.

All these officers bear a close personal relation to the Secretary of State in the conduct of the Department's official business. It is through them, under the Assistant Secretaries, he is enabled to transact his official duties, and it would seem to be the part of prudence and discretion that they should be in sympathetic touch with the head of the Department, to insure cooperation and harmony of action. It is probable that the Secretary of State may not wish to exercise the power conferred upon him to make removals and appointments in these particular positions, but his hands should not be tied or his authority limited whenever, in his judgment, the best interests of the public service demand a change. This freedom of action on the part of the Secretary of State, which should never have been curtailed, would, I believe, promote the public interests. It should certainly instill in those officers a desire to render the best possible service to the Department and stimulate their highest endeavors to discharge their official duties in harmony with the wishes of the Secretary of State.

I may say frankly that my recommendation for a change in this respect is not based upon any want of fidelity on the part of the gentlemen who are at present occupying the seven positions named, or because of a desire to remove any one of them and appoint his successor. They have uniformly shown a commendable spirit of energy and fidelity in carrying forward the great volume of the Department's work, which I can not fail to recognize and appreciate. I have made the recommendation solely because I believe the persons competent to fill these necessarily quasi confidential and important positions should be instantly and freely subject to change by the President or the Secretary of State. I think the service would be benefited by excepting these seven positions from the operations of the civil-service laws.

Respectfully submitted.

JOHN SHERMAN.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 5, 1898.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that that communication may be printed and appropriately referred.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That order will be made, in the absence of objection.

Mr. COCKRELL. In this connection, I desire to say that the communication which has been read is a remarkable production, coming from a Secretary of State who served so long in the Senate, who was here when the civil-service bill was enacted into law, and who knows the force and effect of that law. He must know that the civil-service law gave to the President no authority whatever that he did not theretofore possess under the general law, and that that law vested in the President an absolute discretion whether he would place offices under the civil-service law or not. The extension of the civil-service law has been by Executive action, and not by legislative action. President Arthur extended it just at the close of his term; President Cleveland extended it just at the close of his term, after he had been defeated in 1888; President Harrison did the same thing, and President Cleveland did the same thing again during his second term.

Mr. CULLOM. Worse than ever.

Mr. COCKRELL. President McKinley to-day has the absolute, legal, unrestricted right and power to set aside every solitary order which has been made placing any branch of the public service under the civil-service law and the regulations made under it; and for the Secretary of State to come to Congress for legislative relief when his own chief refuses to grant his request, seems to me to be wonderful presumption.

Mr. ALLISON. I did not especially notice the reading of the communication of the Secretary of State. Does it ask Congress to intervene?

Mr. COCKRELL. Practically, it does. The Secretary recommends it. He recommends it to whom? To Congress.

Mr. ALLISON. But the Senator misapprehends, I think, the situation. As I understand it, the resolution to which this communication is a response, required the Secretary of State to give his opinion respecting the operations of the civil-service law in his Department, whether the Department ought to be subject to its operations, whether it should be extended, or whether it should be modified. I ask that the resolution may be read again, so that we may see precisely what was the request.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read again. The Secretary's response is a recommendation and not an expression of opinion.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will allow me a moment, we have asked from the Secretary of State his opinion, and he has given to us his opinion, which I think he was bound to do on the request of the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. He was bound to give his opinion, but not to make a recommendation to Congress to do that which the President, his chief, has the right to do without legislation.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator allow the resolution to be read, so that we may see what we asked the Secretary of State to do?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes; let the resolution be read.

Mr. CULLOM. I had myself the honor of introducing that resolution.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Let it be read.

Mr. CULLOM. I should like to have the resolution read, because it will show exactly whether the response made by the Secretary of State is in accordance with it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution referred to will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution adopted by the Senate December 18, 1897, as follows:

Resolved, That the heads of the several Executive Departments, respectively, be directed to inform the Senate what appointive positions, if any, in their respective Departments should, in their opinion, be excepted from the operation of the laws governing the civil service or the rules established by the Civil Service Commission.

Resolved, That the said heads of the several Executive Departments, respectively, be directed to inform the Senate what changes or amendments to the present civil-service rules seem to be desirable, as indicated by their experience.

Mr. ALLISON. There was an explicit direction to the Secretary of State to inform us what clerks or other employees in his Department should be exempted from the operations of the civil-service law, and, in response to that request, the Secretary frankly states his views.

Mr. COCKRELL. The resolution did not call for his recommendation, but simply for his opinion. I must confess that my good friend from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] prepared quite a catching resolution to try to relieve the Executive from the responsibility of putting these people under the civil-service law and bring the question before Congress.

Now, let us understand this question once for all. Congress did not place these offices under the civil-service law. Congress gave the Executive only the power to do it. He has exercised that power. He can exercise the power to undo what he has done; and what is the use of Senators and Representatives consuming their time in discussing this subject unless it is the intention to tie the hands of the President and force him against his will to do these things? The President can take these men from under the civil-service law now. If you want to come in here and enact legislation on this subject, say so. Do you propose by legislation to scoop out from under the operation of the civil-service law the people whom the President has placed under that law and who, he says, should be continued under it? That is the question. Is Congress going to undertake to override the will of the President, to take away his discretion, and put it beyond his power to keep these officers under the civil-service law?

Mr. ALLISON. But the Senator from Missouri criticises, as I understand, the Secretary of State for answering explicitly and candidly the inquiry of the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh, no; not for answering it.

Mr. TELLER. The Secretary more than answers it.

Mr. COCKRELL. But for going beyond the answer and recommending to Congress what his chief has now the right and power to do.

Mr. ALLISON. I should be glad to have that part of the communication of the Secretary of State again read. I did not hear it.

Mr. TELLER. Let it be read again.

Mr. ALLISON. Let the whole of it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary again read the communication from the Secretary of State.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I desire merely to say a word, as we shall have plenty of time to debate the general subject when we get the reports all in and take up the question properly, if there shall be occasion for legislation at all.

The only purpose I had in view in introducing the resolution was to get as much information as we could before any legislation on the subject was undertaken by the Senate. We have heard a good deal said by people outside as to what ought to be the change in the law or the regulations.

It seemed to me that there was no class of men in the Government service so well qualified, from their experience in their respective Departments, to say for themselves exactly what change ought to be made in the law or the regulations, and hence it was that I introduced the resolution calling upon the head of each Department to tell us what persons or officers in their employ, if any, ought to be excepted from the civil service, so that we might have all the information before us, coming from the men having the responsibility of great Departments and having to deal with all the subordinates appointed by them.

There is no catch about it. There was no purpose of a catch about it. It was simply to get from the heads of Departments all the information we could secure, they being regarded, so far as I am concerned, as probably better qualified to suggest what modifications ought to be made in the law or the regulations than almost any other class of men. I had no other desire about it; and I think we will find, if we get the reports from the Cabinet officers, as we have had two to-day, that by the time we get all of them and have the information printed we will know more definitely what places, if any, can be excepted than we have been able to ascertain heretofore. I hope we shall get the information.

Mr. ALLEN. If all the answers are of the same drift and tenor as this answer, what does the Senator from Illinois contemplate doing?

Mr. CULLOM. It will then be a question for legislation, if we think legislation necessary, and we will know more definitely, perhaps, whether the President has the power the Senator from Missouri says he has, and whether he ought to modify the rules, and he himself perhaps will know better whether or not he ought to modify the present regulations.

Mr. ALLEN. Does the Senator from Illinois anticipate in that event the introduction of a bill to modify the civil-service law?

Mr. CULLOM. I am frank to say that while I am not in favor of wiping out the civil service at all, I do believe there ought to be modifications of it in the interest of the public service.

Mr. ALLEN. I suppose the Senator recognizes the fact that the civil-service law is constantly being violated?

Mr. CULLOM. I do not know whether or not it is.

Mr. ALLEN. The journals are full of instances of violation. Clerks come to Senators and Representatives by the score and call their attention to violations. There are repeated instances. It can not be possible that the Senator is ignorant of all those things.

Mr. CULLOM. I read what is in the journals and papers, more or less, if the Senator refers to the newspapers of the country.

Mr. ALLEN. I refer to the newspapers and to the fact that persons who have served under the civil-service law for years are reduced to lower stations and lower salaries upon a change of Administration, and if they rebel against the reduction their office is abolished and they are dropped through, as water is through a sieve. The next day the office is reestablished and another person is appointed to the place. That is a condition of affairs which is notorious.

Mr. CULLOM. I think that is probably more or less true.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska whether it is not true that until recently there never had been any civil-service regulation or rule to prevent the removal of a person in the classified service?

Mr. ALLEN. I do not know whether or not there has been, but if there has not been, there has not been much of a civil-service law.

Mr. SPOONER. A rule has recently been made that a man can not be removed without being informed of the charges against him.

Mr. CULLOM. The President of the United States has amended the rule in that respect.

Mr. ALLEN. It is daily openly violated by heads of Departments.

Mr. CULLOM. Does the Senator think that is true now?

Mr. ALLEN. I say it is true now.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not know whether or not it is, but I do know that, somewhat to the surprise of some of us, the President of the United States made a more rigid rule than existed before, to prevent the very thing the Senator says is going on now.

Mr. ALLEN. The civil-service law as administered is a hiss and a byword in this country, and every man understands that a change of Administration means the dropping out of a lot of clerks, subordinate officers occupying positions in the Departments, and the introduction of new ones.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator from Nebraska is through, I will state that I am not here especially as the advocate of the civil-service law. I do not believe very much in the law or the rules that have been made under it, and I think that many of the rules in reference to it are absurd, as the Senator from Colorado said to-day, with respect to watchmen and such people employed in the Departments being put under the civil service. I think, however, that the great body of the clerks in the Departments and bureaus perhaps ought to be under the civil service.

Mr. GRAY. Do not say perhaps.

Mr. CULLOM. They ought to be, then, if the Senator from Delaware objects to the use of the word "perhaps."

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator from Illinois will allow me——

Mr. CULLOM. However, I should like to keep in the word "perhaps" until we find out exactly where we are with reference to the subject.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will permit me, I will call his attention to a matter which came to me the other day, without disclosing the name of my informant, who is a man in position to know, a reliable man, a man of experience. He said the clerks who were appointed under the civil service to weigh the mail or to superintend the weighing of the mails carried under contract by the railroads and the steamship companies were in almost every instance absolutely incompetent to discharge the duties, although they had passed a civil-service examination.

If they said that a certain amount of mail matter weighed 600 pounds, and a skilled old expert of the railroad said 1,000 or 1,500 pounds, his word was taken and they were ignored. Would it not be better for the public, would it not come nearer a merit system, if that word is to be used in discussion and in legislation, to appoint men having natural fitness and competency to discharge those duties——

Mr. CULLOM. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. ALLEN. Than to take some cigarette-smoking dude who has just left school and who knows nothing of the practical details of business and put him in charge?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois a question, as we have the subject up for general debate. Does the Senator believe that in the original civil-service law as it was passed there was any intention or any anticipation that there would be any limit at all on the power of removal in the Executive Departments as to clerks appointed even under the civil service?

Mr. CULLOM. So far as that is concerned, I think we are very far away, in the administration of the civil-service law, from where we thought we were when we adopted it; and that is one reason why I am disposed to want the matter investigated from top to bottom in order to see exactly what the men now in charge of the Government have to say with reference to the absurdity of some of the regulations which have been made under the law.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The bad administration of a law ought not to be made an objection to the law. When the law was adopted, unless I am very much mistaken, there was no thought, no idea of limiting the power of removal. It was simply to provide a method of appointment and to prevent appointments being made simply for the purpose of rewarding party service. But I believe the Executive Department ought now to have the power to remove any clerk whenever the head thereof is satisfied the clerk is not discharging the duties of his office or that he is not competent to do it.

Mr. CULLOM. So do I.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Whenever the chief believes that, he ought to have the power to put the clerk out; but let the place be filled through the civil service.

Mr. CULLOM. I agree with the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. SPOONER. Have not the heads of Departments that power now?

Mr. CHILTON. Do they not possess that power to-day?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I understand the Civil Service Commission claims that by some provision put into an appropriation act a man can not be removed except for cause, and the President of the United States has recently issued an order that nobody shall be removed except on written charges, and they shall be proved, as I understand. I do not believe there is a line of law anywhere to justify the practice.

Mr. SPOONER. That is different. That is a rule of Executive action.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. COCKRELL. When the civil-service bill was passed, the man who drafted the measure, its father, Dorman B. Eaton (he presented it to the Select Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, and it was reported by the Senator from Ohio, Mr. Pendleton), expressly said that the object of the bill was not to guard the exit from office, but only the entrance, and that it had nothing on earth to do with removals or retention in office. That was the law, it has been the law, and it is the law to-day, unless Executive authority has modified or changed it.

Mr. CULLOM. Exactly, and therefore, at my suggestion, the Senate called upon the heads of Departments to answer the question whether there are any people employed by them under the civil service who ought to be excepted from it. I want the facts, so that when we come to legislate upon the question, if we have to do it, we may know what the situation is and the country and the Administration may know what the condition of affairs is. Let the President act in the light of what his own Cabinet officers say ought to be the rule in reference to the government of the different Departments by them, and if, as the Secretary of State says in direct answer to the inquiry made by the Senate resolution, there are seven men who ought not to be under the civil service, let the President, if he has the authority, relieve them from the civil service.

Mr. TELLER. He has the authority, beyond all question.

Mr. CULLOM. If he has, he will know from his own Secretary of State, at any rate, that the latter believes those seven men ought to be taken from under the civil-service law.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Does not the Secretary of State suggest that this action must be taken by the Senate?

Mr. CULLOM. The Secretary of State makes some sort of a general answer which may possibly be construed as a recommendation to Congress to legislate, but I do not think the Secretary of State means that at all.

Mr. GRAY. I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois whether he agrees that Congress can legislate efficiently so as to bind the Executive in all the Departments, and whether the existence of the civil-service rules does not depend largely upon the will of the Executive?

Mr. CULLOM. I think it does.

Mr. GRAY. Can we restrain the Executive in the power given him by the Constitution or trammel him at all in regard to appointments? Can we do more than provide a certain machinery of which he can avail himself if he chooses in making appointments to the civil service?

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator's question would lead to a general discussion of the constitutional authority.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will say to the Senator from Delaware, with the permission of the Senator from Illinois, that that question has been decided by the Supreme Court, and I do not think there is any question at all about the power of Congress, if it choose to do it, so far as concerns any officer appointed by the heads of Departments, under the provision of the Constitution. As to any other officers, the question has never been decided, but I do not think it could.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator from West Virginia must have misunderstood me. I spoke of the Chief Executive, as a part of his power in the matter—the President.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not care to take up the time of the Senate further. I think the Secretary of State answers the interrogatory put in the resolution——

Mr. FAULKNER. If the Senator from Illinois will permit me, I supposed the Senator from Delaware was asking a practical question. No law has ever been enacted that put any limitation upon the power of the President as to appointments by the President. It is only as to officers who are appointed by the heads of Departments.

Mr. ALLEN. Suppose he should appoint a man who is an alien? Can we limit that power?

Mr. FAULKNER. That is not involved in the civil-service question at all. I do not want to be understood as advocating the civil-service system, because I am not a civil service reformer, and I am only speaking of a question of law.

Mr. GRAY. Does the Senator from West Virginia desire to keep the civil-service law as it is and not reform it?

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from West Virginia went too far when he said there can be no limitation put upon the Executive. Suppose the President of the United States should undertake to appoint Queen Victoria to an office in this country, or to confer upon her some lucrative position; does the Senator from West Virginia say that Congress has no power to prevent it; that the President of the United States may go all over the world and select such agencies to conduct this Government as he may see fit?

Mr. FAULKNER. I have not raised any question of that sort.

Mr. ALLEN. Then the Senator must modify his statement that the Chief Executive is without limitation as to his appointing power.

Mr. FAULKNER. I did not say that, and therefore there is no necessity for a modification. I simply say that it is a debatable question whether or not Congress has the right to put any limitation upon the power of the President as to appointments, under the provision of the Constitution conferring that authority upon him.

Mr. ALLEN. Is it not true that in this country each of the three several departments of the Government is a check upon the other?

Mr. FAULKNER. I thought they were coordinate and independent. That is the way I have always understood it.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator pleases, coordinate and independent—within the sphere of their constitutional office.

Mr. FAULKNER. That is right.

Mr. ALLEN. But it is not within the constitutional right of the Chief Executive of the nation, at his caprice, to appoint to an office whomsoever he may see fit, regardless of whether or not that individual is a citizen of the United States. It is not an office without its limitation.

Mr. CULLOM. I should like to——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the debate is proceeding with the consent of the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER].

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 5, 1898.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by the Speaker.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, December 18, 1897, was read and approved.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER announced the following changes of reference:

House Document No. 31, a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a letter from the Commissioner of Pensions, with accompanying papers, relating to the alleged fraudulent pensioning of Elizabeth, mother of James T. Hughes—from the Committee on Invalid Pensions to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (H. R. 1166) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Navy to furnish to L. L. Eggleston Post, No. 184, Department of New York, Grand Army of the Republic, of Deposit, N. Y., a condemned cannon—from the Committee on Military Affairs to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

House Document No. 92, being a letter from the Acting Attorney-General, transmitting a list of judgments rendered in favor of claimants and against the United States and defendant Indian tribes and not heretofore appropriated for—from the Committee on Indian Affairs to the Committee on Appropriations.

House bill 3963, to permit certain parties to intervene in the equity cause of the United States against Morris and others, pending in the supreme court of the District of Columbia—from the Committee on the District of Columbia to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, these changes of reference will be considered as agreed to.

There was no objection.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. MOODY, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of further considering the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, with Mr. HOPKINS in the chair.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, as gentlemen upon both sides of the House very well understand, the pending bill has received full consideration, except that part of it upon page 23 relating to the appropriation for the maintenance of the Civil Service Commission.

In pursuance of an understanding entered into on some previous day, the consideration of that paragraph was postponed until this time. The proposition made, which received general assent, was that from this time this paragraph should be under general debate until such time as the House should see fit to conclude it.

I do not know, Mr. Chairman, that there is any occasion for me to say anything further. I do not know that it is proposed that the time should be controlled by gentlemen upon the respective sides of this question. I understand that gentlemen desiring to speak have left their names with the Chair, and that it is the purpose of the Chair to so control the debate that gentlemen will speak alternately upon the two sides of the question, not upon the two sides of the House, and that full opportunity will be given every member for the expression of his views.

Mr. DOCKERY. Do I understand the gentleman to say that an agreement has been reached that the Chair is to control the time?

Mr. MOODY. I do not understand that any such agreement has been reached, but it seemed to me that on the whole that was the wisest way to divide the time, because the differences of opinion on this subject do not coincide with the divisions of the House upon general political subjects, and what we want to have is a fair division of time between those who differ in opinion upon this subject.

Mr. DOCKERY. Does the gentleman ask for the control of the time in that way?

Mr. MOODY. I do not know that I said that. I said that as to the general debate that is a fair method to divide the time. I am content with it, to say the least.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I think we had better let the matter run for a day or two as it is.

Mr. MOODY. I do not propose, Mr. Chairman, to make any arrangement, but only to bring the subject before the attention of the committee.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, if I can have the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY]. This is Wednesday, I believe. As one member of the committee, it seems to me that this bill ought to pass between this and Saturday night. Now, as to how this time will be controlled, I think it quite immaterial whether my friend the gentleman from Massachusetts shall control it on the one hand and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] on the other, or whether the Chair shall control it; but I hope there will be no arrangement made that looks beyond the present week for the final disposition of this bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. I will say, Mr. Chairman, in reply to the chairman of the committee, that I do not understand the gentleman from Massachusetts suggests at this time any limitation upon the debate. I certainly would not desire to agree to any limitation at this time. As I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY], he expresses a desire, at least, that the Chair should control the time and divide it.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, I will say that was rather a repetition of a desire which had already been expressed by the chairman of the subcommittee having this bill in charge. I have no independent views of my own. I certainly hope that the free expression of views that he alluded to can be completed, so that this bill will receive its final passage by Saturday night. I suppose that all agree that it is desirable to do that.

Mr. DOCKERY. I simply desire to express the desire on this side that the time be controlled by the gentleman from Massachusetts on the one side and a gentleman representing the minority on this side.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts it seems to me that that is desirable.

Mr. MOODY. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time during the progress of this debate shall be equally divided, one part to be controlled by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] and the other part to be controlled by myself.

Mr. KNOX. I desire to ask my colleague if the time for debate is to be limited?

Mr. MOODY. I understand that remains an open question.

Mr. CANNON. I hope, however, it can be settled now satisfactorily to the gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from Missouri. Why not agree as to the time now?

Mr. DOCKERY. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that I am not prepared at this time to offer any agreement, inasmuch as I have not had an opportunity as yet to consult with gentlemen on this side who may desire to speak.

Mr. CANNON. You can settle that time in the future, either to-day or to-morrow.

Mr. DOCKERY. The question of the limitation of the debate can be settled in the future, after I shall have had an opportunity to ascertain who desire to be heard.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the proposition made by the gentleman from Massachusetts is scarcely a fair one. Now, I understand that those he represents are opposed to any modification of the present system. The gentlemen on the other side are in favor of the entire repeal or destruction of the present system. Now, there is a large body of gentlemen here who do not agree with either. They propose a wholesome and proper modification of the system.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HEPBURN. And there are, therefore, three sides to this question; and the arrangement the gentlemen have made——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. HEPBURN. I do.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to know how you come to the conclusion that everybody here is in favor of the repeal of the whole business?

Mr. HEPBURN. Simply because that would be wrong. [General laughter and loud applause on the Republican side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, there ought to be some arrangement in the division of time by which that large body of gentlemen (certainly more than a hundred of the Republican members of this House) who want a modification should have some portion of the time, and I insist that it shall be divided in that way rather than in the manner suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. KNOX. I should like to ask my colleague how the limit of the time for debate is to be obtained?

Mr. MOODY. There would be some affirmative proposition in the way of limiting the time.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. There appearing to be such a muddle among the Republicans on this subject, does not the gentleman think it would be better to attempt to settle the matter among themselves?

Mr. HEPBURN. There is no muddle about it. We will all agree when the time comes.

Mr. MOODY. I do not think the gentleman meant to misrepresent my request.

Mr. HEPBURN. I only formed an opinion on what the gentleman said——

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa will suspend.

Mr. RICHARDSON. And that is, What is the pending motion?

The CHAIRMAN. It is the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Is it to strike out the appropriation or is it simply to pass the provision as it is inserted in the legislative bill? If so, Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Tennessee that this discussion relates simply to general debate on the provision.

Mr. RICHARDSON. But there must be a motion pending.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. RICHARDSON. There can be but two sides to a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The understanding of the Chair is that the time was to be set apart on this day for general debate on this subject, and after the close of general debate that the committee will take such action as in its wisdom it may choose.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The proposition pending, as I understand it, is to adopt the text of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee has not come to that.

Mr. MOODY. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that I agree entirely with the views which have been expressed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] in regard to the division of time in this debate. So far as the time is within my control he may be assured that, according to the best justice I can do, the time will be divided fairly, according to the differences of view upon this side of the House. Of course, however, I am subject to error, and I am by no means anxious to assume the responsibility of controlling the time.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. MOODY. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to suggest that it is not the common practice, where the time for a debate is unlimited, to have it controlled by particular gentlemen on either side. If a limitation of the debate had been agreed to, then I would be perfectly willing to see the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] control the time on the one side and on the other; but the debate being unlimited, so far as any action of the House now is concerned, I think it is fair and right that all shades of opinion should be privileged to have a hearing without being required to ask permission of any gentleman on the floor.

Mr. MOODY. Let me say to the gentleman from Texas, who probably was not in at the beginning of this discussion, that the method which he suggests is the one which I originally proposed to the House, but as the result of a suggestion by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], followed by a suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. CANNON], the proposition was submitted to the House in the form in which it is now pending. I have no desire whatever to control the time and did not expect to, but if I do control it, I shall try to control it according to justice.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that the suggestion I made arose from the fact that several gentlemen around me here insisted that the time on this side should be controlled by the minority of the committee. That is why I made the suggestion.

Mr. BAILEY. The usual practice would be that the Chair would first recognize the members of the committee, both of the majority and of the minority, and then, after those gentlemen had exhausted the time, or had exhausted themselves, as the case might be, he would recognize others.

A MEMBER. Or after they had exhausted the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAILEY. When we reach a point where we know how much more time is desired for the debate, then it will be entirely proper that the remaining time shall be controlled by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY].

Mr. MOODY. We do not want to control the time under such circumstances just when the pressure becomes greatest.

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask if the Chair has not in its possession a list of members who desire to speak on this subject—a list coming over from the December session? It seems to me fairer to let the gentlemen upon that list come in and speak in their own time than to require them to obtain time of others.

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that I have no disposition to interfere with any arrangement that has been agreed upon. I have simply volunteered a suggestion as to what has been the practice heretofore.

Mr. HEPBURN. I want to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that in the suggestion I made with regard to the disposition of the time I did not desire to introduce any possible element of unfairness.

Mr. MOODY. Not at all. I did not so understand it.

Mr. HEPBURN. But it seemed to me that the proposition for alternation in the debate which the gentleman suggested was scarcely a fair method of disposing of the time, and I would much rather, if it be agreeable to the gentleman from Massachusetts, that the Chair should allot the time.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, it is quite evident that this morning there can be no unanimous consent as to time this debate shall run, or as to how the time shall be controlled, except through the Chair. I indulge the hope, however, that by to-morrow we shall have progressed so far that we can come to an agreement or can take such action as will close the debate and dispose of this bill this week.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, after the expression of views that has been had upon the floor, I withdraw the request for unanimous consent and ask that the pending paragraph of the bill be read.

The paragraph was read, as follows:

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

For three Commissioners, at $3,500 each; chief examiner, $3,000; secretary, $2,000; eight clerks of class 4; ten clerks of class 3; thirteen clerks of class 2; fifteen clerks of class 1; three clerks, at $1,000 each; two clerks, at $900 each; one messenger; two laborers; engineer, $840; and two watchmen; in all, $91,340.

For necessary traveling expenses, including those of examiners acting under the direction of the commission, and for expenses of examinations and investigations held elsewhere than at Washington, $7,000.

Mr. GROW rose.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the Chair that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW] desires to be heard for about twenty minutes, and as no member of the committee is ready to speak at the present time, I shall be glad if he may be allowed to occupy the floor.

Mr. DOCKERY. What is the request?

The CHAIRMAN. The purpose of the Chair was to recognize members in the order in which they made their requests for recognition, and if no member of the committee is ready to speak, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PEARSON] would be entitled to the floor.

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Chairman, I very willingly yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for twenty minutes.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Chairman, I shall not trespass upon the time of the committee with any discussion as to the mode in which the civil-service law has been administered heretofore by any Administration. The manner of administration of a law is, however, an essential part of it.

There is no question that there should be some law to regulate, to a certain extent at least, appointments to office in such a way as to relieve the President from spending so much of his time in hearing the application of every applicant for all the offices that are to be filled. Either the lives of our Presidents must be assured by a physically iron constitution or they can not live out their full official terms, if they must, in addition to other duties, be engaged in examining all the cases of appointments.

Whether the system I shall now suggest could be introduced without a change of the Constitution may be a question; but I think that by a law of Congress approved by the President regulating the mode of appointment might continue in practice the same as it would——

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of order. We desire to hear the gentleman from Pennsylvania on this subject, and there is so much confusion that we can not do so unless we are near him.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order made by the gentleman from Maine is well taken. The committee will please be in order.

Mr. GROW. I was saying, Mr. Chairman, that as the Constitution vests the appointing power in the President, an amendment of the Constitution might be necessary to introduce a change in that respect. But a law of Congress, approved by the President, might, by such acquiescence by the Executive, take the place of a formal amendment to the Constitution.

Without discussing at length any proposed change, I simply wish to express at this time my views on this subject, which are not merely the views of to-day. I have been committed to them for a third of a century. Without stoping to discuss the constitutional difficulty which might be in the way, I would have a civil-service regulation taking from the President the power to appoint any officer of the Government save the judges of the courts of the United States and the representatives of our Government in foreign countries. These appointments should be left to the President for this reason: The judiciary is a coordinate branch of the Government, and the power of appointment could not well be vested in any inferior tribunal.

Mr. PEARSON. Would the gentleman allow the President to appoint his own Cabinet?

Mr. GROW. I will come to that question in a moment. The appointment of all foreign officials of the Government should remain with the President, because he represents our nation in its intercourse with other nations. Those two classes of appointments therefore should be left with the President. The members of his Cabinet he would have, of course, the right to appoint, for they are his own official family, and it is nobody's business whom he may choose for those positions. But I would vest in each officer of the Cabinet the appointment of all persons engaged in his branch of the service, and would hold him responsible for the faithful performance of public duty in his Department. Such appointments as are by law to be confirmed by the Senate I would have, as now, transmitted to it by the President. Thus all appointments of that character would pass through his hands. Under the prerogative of his office he might object to some of them if he chose.

But in this way he would be relieved from sitting day by day for the determination of minor appointments when the most momentous questions between this nation and others, and questions involving perhaps its life, might be at stake. He would be relieved from the necessity of devoting his time to hearing every applicant or the Members and Senators representing such applicant. At present the member of Congress representing the applicant's district must go to the President in behalf of the applicant. This is a duty which he owes to his constituents. Under the existing system the President in his executive office must, during a period when the life of the nation and the hopes of mankind might hang suspended upon the battlefield, listen day by day to these applications.

Let me illustrate by a single case. During the Presidency of Mr. Lincoln I desired the appointment of a judge in one of the Territories. The President made a memorandum of the matter. I went to call upon him one day, not to call his attention to this matter, but as soon as I entered the Executive Chamber he said, "Mr. Speaker, I meant to appoint your friend to that judgeship, but a woman came in here, with nine small children and one at the breast, and pleaded the bread act on me, and breaded me out of it." I said, "Very well, Mr. President. If there is anybody needing consideration and cooperation from the Government it is the Union men in the insurrectionary States." This was one of such cases. The family had been driven out because of their Union sentiments. "But," said he, "I will attend to the matter; let me take the name again."

He went to his hat filled with papers and began to fumble over them, remarking, "I have a queer way of doing things." "Yes, Mr. President," I replied, "if your hat should blow off in the street, state secrets might be scattered." He took out a paper, on which he put down the name. "Now," said he, "I will attend to the matter when it comes around." As I left the chamber I queried with myself, Why should a President of the United States in such an hour be required to spend his time and strength listening to applications for subordinate positions in the Government? The law should require an applicant to present his case to the proper Department of the Government—the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, or whatever Department the office he is applying for might belong to.

Here was a President, charged with greater responsibility than ever fell to the lot of any ruler since time began, required to spend his time and strength in considering official appointments all the way down to collectorships and little post-offices. This greatest American of the nineteenth century, who, among all the world's civil rulers in peace or war, will through all time hold no inferior niche in the pantheon of human greatness, was thus occupied. Why impose these duties upon the President, when such duties are constantly multiplying and have multiplied from a few thousand appointments to hundreds of thousands?

Strictly, the Constitution would have to be changed to take away from him his prerogative to make all appointments; but a law of Congress, assented to by his signature, would be the same in practical effect as a change in the Constitution in that regard if it were acquiesced in by the Executive, as undoubtedly it would be in this case.

I am opposed to any life tenure in the civil service except in the case of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, and there should be an exception in their case, by reason of the fact that the Government takes their life services for the good of the country, and pays them a compensation less than a common lawyer receives in his practice at the bar of any of the States of the Union. They spend their lifetime in the consideration of great questions affecting society, affecting the States of the Union and the rights of the people.

I would leave them on the retired list for the balance of their lives after they have given their life services to the consideration of the grave questions in which their countrymen are so vitally interested. Their case should, therefore, be a special exception in any general law. But all appointments, save the judiciary and those in our foreign relations, should be placed upon an entirely different plane. Take from the President by law the making of these appointments, so that he could say when we fill his antechambers with our constituents who are applicants for appointment that "the law does not permit me to make them; you must go to the proper Department fixed by the lawmaking power for that purpose."

The Constitution requires the President to make recommendations as to the state of public affairs, and he may from time to time recommend to Congress such matters as may seem to be of importance in his judgment. His time should be given to the maturing of great questions of that character, for the consideration of the legislative branch of the Government, and in connection with our relations with foreign Governments. This being the case, why should his time be taken up with the consideration of the appointments in the various Departments of the Government, instead of being given to the consideration of those great questions which affect the interests, the welfare, and happiness of the whole people?

I have, Mr. Chairman, given hastily the outlines of my views of what I believe the proper system of civil service should be in this country. I know, of course, that without the acquiescence of the President such a system can not prevail unless the law takes the form of a constitutional amendment. But it seems to me that such a system can be devised as will meet every requirement in that regard. It is necessary that something of the kind should be done, if we would spare the life of our Presidents.

It was only the iron constitution and great physical endurance of Abraham Lincoln that enabled him to go through the mighty struggle of five years, when the very air throughout every part of the country was vibrating with the strains of martial music and mighty armies were marching and countermarching preparatory to the deadly conflict on the battlefield, upon which hung the perpetuity of the Union and the hopes of the great and good of mankind, that was to determine whether the free institutions bequeathed by our fathers should be transmitted unimpaired to future times. For if this Republic, torn by faction and internal strife, should fall rent and dismembered, the last great experiment of free elective government among men has been tried, and the oppressed and downtrodden of the world could then hug their chains as the only legacy they could bequeath their children.

There was no period during four years of his Administration that the shadow of war was not hanging darkly over the land, and when the very life of the nation was not in danger.

Relieve the President of the responsibility in the making of appointments other than those indicated and allow the heads of the Departments to select their confidential and chief clerks, and at the same time abolish the various classifications of salaries. That is one of the mistakes made in the administration of this law.

As long as there is a salary list, varying from $720 a year to $1,600 or $1,800, whoever administers the law has an opportunity by reclassifying to put in their political favorites, by putting personal friends into the higher salaried places and reducing others to the lower grades. In the mutation of politics, in the changes in the political heads of the various Departments, these different salaries offer great temptation for a maladministration of the law and injustice to faithful and competent employees for the mere purpose of rewarding political favorites. I know of clerks in the Pension Office who have drawn a salary of $1,000, $1,400, and $1,600 a year, and yet have remained at the same desk and performed precisely the same kind of work all the time. From $1,600 they were changed by a change of Administration to $1,400, then back to $1,600, then from $1,600 to $1,200—just by a political change in the Administration.

There should be but two classes of salaries for all clerkships, and then make the law imperative that no clerk, except for cause, shall be reclassified in salary from a higher to a lower one.

I have thus presented briefly my views on this question, long entertained and confirmed by experience. I would not have the "spoils system," as it is called, prevail, so that every Administration that comes into power in the changing politics of the country might use these high places as "sugar plums" and favors for a few political favorites without qualification for the duties of the positions sought.

The modification of the system as I have suggested would take away that feature. The great evil complained of at the time of the passage of the civil-service law was that the political classes at the points of great population could combine for the nomination of some person for President whom they felt assured would give them the offices they might ask for, and thus they could by such action forestall to a great degree the free action of Presidential conventions. The modification I suggest would effectually remove such complaint, for no one could possibly know who the Cabinet of a President would be before election, and the selection of a candidate for President would therefore rest wholly upon public sentiment.

There should be no regulation such that a person who holds office under the Government can not maintain his manhood without fear of losing his position. Why should he, from the time he goes into office, feel that he is bound to suppress his honest convictions or lose the place he holds? It is a degradation and a dishonor to write over the office doors of the Government of this Union, "Who enters here leaves his manhood and his honest convictions behind." The officeholder is a citizen of the United States as much bound to have political convictions as any other citizen of the country. He is a part of it.

He has a right to contribute his money where he pleases, and no official of the Government any more than anyone else has a right to impose a tax on him for any purpose without his consent. The law should prevent that, for it is the same as the highwayman's command to stand and deliver. I would have those two evils abolished by law. The law should prevent the taking from the salary of any official of the Government under duress one cent, for that is the effect in levying contributions upon the officeholders of the Government without their free and voluntary consent. Prevent that, prevent reclassification of the clerks upon a change of Administration, and make all appointments as far as possible by the Secretaries in their own Departments, and you will have done away with most if not all the evils that are complained of concerning the office-holding class in the Government.

Mr. Chairman, I am obliged to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PEARSON] and to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] for their kindness in yielding me the floor for these few minutes, and to the House for its courtesy.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, this is an appropriate time for the discussion of the national civil service. The pending bill not only provides for the maintenance of the Civil Service Commission, but also appropriates for the salaries of those who are in the service in the Departments at Washington. Anything which touches upon their mode of appointment or their tenure of office, anything which relates to the good of the service, is relevant to the subject under consideration.

We expend in the civil service of the United States approximately $100,000,000, of which seven-tenths, or about $70,000,000, are expended for the salaries of those who are under the control of the act of January 16, 1883, commonly known as the civil-service law. Any consideration which affects this vast expenditure of money, greater than the total annual expenditure of the Government before the civil war, is of the highest importance to the country. I for one, then, welcome this debate. I trust that the time indicated for it will be sufficient to permit all who desire the opportunity to express their views freely.

I call the attention of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] to the fact that while I stand firmly upon the platform of the Republican party, and with the declarations of the President, I have no sympathy with those who declare this law to be perfect in its operation, and who blindly oppose every change except that of extension. I myself believe, Mr. Chairman, that there are two changes which ought to be made in the law. I hope to see them made, either by the action of the President or of Congress. I believe that they are not steps backward, but steps forward. I believe that they are not in hostility to the present law, but in accordance with its true spirit.

In the first place, I would say that those who entered into the classified service otherwise than by the examinations prescribed by law and who are included therein and protected in their tenure by Executive order ought in all fairness to be compelled to submit to some test of their efficiency, a test which should be gradually applied in the Departments where they are employed. If they were unable to meet these tests, with all the advantages of the experience which they have had, then in the interest of the public service they ought to leave it.

If this were done in the many cases where partisan appointments have been made and the appointees protected in their tenure by Executive order including them in the classified list, the sense of injustice and inequality which now so largely prevails would be relieved. Tests of the kind which I have mentioned are now being imposed, I am told, in the Treasury Department, and successfully imposed. Why should they not be extended by Executive order to all branches of the service? Under this Administration no faithful and capable officer need fear them, and for others we do not care.

I believe that we have got to do something also to preserve the efficiency of the service—I might almost say to restore the efficiency of the service. We have the testimony of a high Treasury official that in that Department "the tree is dead at the top," and that "this condition is a menace to the civil service." Anyone who has even a superficial knowledge of the service at Washington, a knowledge such as I have obtained by my short service upon the Appropriations Committee, knows that this is not peculiar to the Treasury. It extends throughout the service. We must find some way to separate from it those who, by reason of age or physical or mental incapacity, can no longer render an equivalent for the salaries which the Government pays them. A remedy must be found.

It does not lie, Mr. Chairman, in the establishment of a civil pension list. It is the first step that costs. The first step in the establishment of a civil pension list was taken the other day when the Treasury Department placed sixty or seventy of its employees upon what they themselves termed "a practical pension," notifying them in effect that they could work or not, as they pleased, and that they would retain their tenure of office in the subordinate places assigned them during the rest of their lives.

The merit system, Mr. Chairman, does not prescribe tenure for life, but tenure during efficiency. I was glad to see, the other day, that a convention of those who believe in that system declared against the establishment of a civil pension list. The people bear cheerfully the burden of pensions for the Army and Navy, asking that the worthy alone receive the Government's bounty. The people look with dismay at the beginning of a civil pension, whose end no one can foresee.

This step must be retraced. If heads of Departments and bureaus had not the sympathies which arise out of association and were able to resist the pressure for retention which men and women long in the service are able to command, they could be depended upon to separate from the service one who had become inefficient. But as long as men are human and do not act as inexorably as machines, this will not be done. Until then we must rely upon the law to rid the service of incompetents. The appointment for a definite term, the retirement annually of a certain percentage of the employees, or the retirement of all at a named age, have each been suggested as a remedy. Some one of these plans or some combination of them must be adopted if we would maintain the standard of service which a high rate of compensation gives the Government the right to exact.

But it was not my purpose, Mr. Chairman, to suggest changes or improvements in the law, but rather to defend it from those who, unmindful of the record of the Republican party, would cripple or destroy it. It is not easy to know what the opponents of the system propose to do. They do not agree among themselves. Certainly it is not to be supposed that they in considerable numbers will vote to strike out this appropriation for the maintenance of the commission. That would be childish. Another member of the committee proposes to demonstrate to the House how useless and ineffective this course would be.

Few, I take it, will openly indorse the views of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY], who proposes—and I quote his exact language—"to repeal the civil-service laws, root and branch;" and he declares that "there is no way of maintaining party organization except giving your friends the offices." In this Chamber he holds aloft the picture emblem of Tammany Hall as an example and inspiration to Republicans. I was anxious to see what my genial friend proposed in the form of a bill, and I have it before me now. It is House bill 1084, and it is very brief and very effective. He proposes by the first section to repeal the act of January 16, 1883, and all other laws providing for the appointment of Civil Service Commissioners. He proposes in the third section—

> That no candidate or applicant for any such nonelective office, place, or employment shall hereafter be required to stand any civil-service examination by any Civil Service Commissioners.

And he proposes in the second section that no term of office shall extend beyond four years from the date of the appointment of its holder, and at the end of the four years from "that day all the offices, places, and employments of the Government of the United States filled by appointment shall become vacant."

As there are about 178,000 of such offices, most of them would already have reached the limitation imposed by that bill, and the rest of them soon would do so. Washington, if this bill should pass, would be a salubrious place of living for a Senator or Member of Congress; and if the genial gentleman from North Carolina should succeed in passing the bill the effect of it would be so far from satisfactory, I believe, that we should see him flying from Washington crying in the words of the poet:

> Oh, for a lodge in some vast wilderness,
> Some boundless continuity of shade,
> Where rumors of offices to be sought,
> Of unsuccessful or successful hopes,
> May never reach me more.

[Laughter and applause.]

I take it, however, that more of the opponents of the merit system agree with the views expressed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR]. I regret that he is not here to-day. He may be assured that I shall say nothing with reference to his views in his absence of which he could complain; but yet he is so conspicuous in this movement that any discussion would be incomplete without some reference to the view which he has expressed. He has recently informed the House that he will be satisfied with nothing less than a limitation of the operations of the law of 1883 to the clerical departments in Washington and the postal service of the country.

It is dangerous and presumptuous to prophesy to a prophet. But I undertake to say to the distinguished gentleman from Ohio that the closing days of the Fifty-fifth Congress will find him in an exceedingly dissatisfied frame of mind, if so much as that is required to fill his cup of happiness. But the concession of the gentleman from Ohio is the most weighty testimonial which the merit system has ever received. He would leave it in operation where? In two of the places where, in the most conspicuous way and for the longest time, it has been tested and has had the best opportunity of showing whether it is good or bad. He would leave it in operation in the Departments at Washington, where all the testimony which I have been able to obtain from any quarter shows that under it the service has improved continually in character and efficiency.

He would leave it in operation in the postal service, where it has demonstrated its benefits to the people in their daily life. This is especially true in the Railway Mail Service. That service shows the fullest development of the merit system which there is in existence to-day. There is an examination for entrance, there are periodical tests for retention, and within a few months there are tests for promotion.

Mr. LANDIS. Was not that true before the Railway Mail Service was taken into the classified service?

Mr. MOODY. It was not true, and if the gentleman will consult the figures and will pay some attention to what I am about to say, I think I will show him that it was not true.

Mr. LANDIS. Do you mean to say that there were not periodical tests of fitness?

Mr. MOODY. Oh, I did not say that.

Mr. LANDIS. That is what I meant to ask you.

Mr. MOODY. I do not know whether there were or not. I think it very likely that there were. In this service the system got into complete operation, got completely on its feet, in 1891, and under it there has been a most remarkable increase of efficiency shown, so much so that in the last year the records showed but a single error in 12,000 pieces handled by the clerks. What it has done may be summed up in the words of the Superintendent of that service. He says:

> It will be seen that while the amount of mail handled has increased 77⅞ per cent in ten years, the working force required to do the work has increased but 48⅝ per cent, and the pieces of mail matter handled correctly to each error in distribution have increased from 3,000 and some odd to 11,000.

In this connection, I ask permission to insert in the RECORD, without reading them on the floor, some statements taken from the report of the Superintendent.

Mr. MAHON. Does not the gentleman know that that efficiency of which he speaks has been brought about not by the Civil Service Commission, or the civil-service law, but by the severe tests and examinations made by the Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service along the different lines of railway? For instance, before a mail agent can get a position to run between New York City and Chicago, or between New York and Pittsburg, he is called off at Harrisburg once in every two or three months and given, say, a thousand letters, addressed in different handwritings, some of them very difficult to make out, addressed to remote post-offices in different parts of the United States; he is required to drop those thousand letters into prepared pigeonholes and he must drop over 950 of them correctly in order to get the required percentage. The efficiency, therefore, is not due to the civil service, but to the mail service itself.

Mr. MOODY. That is exactly what I call civil-service reform. I do not care by what name you call it; I do not care whether it is under the law of 1883 or under the practice of the Department. It is in accordance with the theory that before men shall be permitted to serve the Government they must show that they are efficient in the work that they are about to undertake.

Mr. HEPBURN. While the gentleman is discussing this matter of the Railway Mail Service, will he give his views upon the subject of the organizing of a political organization within that order for the purpose of coercing members of Congress to increase the salaries of the employees in that service?

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, I have no hesitation in giving my views upon that subject. I expressed them publicly more than a year ago in the neighboring city of Philadelphia. I believe that is one of the evils that we must guard against under the present tenure of office under the merit system. I believe it is a danger which should be guarded against by law, and I agree entirely with the implication in the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa, that that is a dangerous thing which the law must crush out.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the results that I have undertaken to show in the Railway Mail Service subserve the interest of the country a great deal better than the giving of these 7,000 offices "to our friends." If the system is good in Washington, why is it not equally good in Chicago, in New York, and in Boston? Why limit it to the Departments where it has demonstrated its benefits? Why not extend it all over the country? If it is good or bad for the employees of a post-office, it is good or bad for the employees of a custom-house of corresponding grade. Let us be consistent. Let us either extend this system to all branches of the service, or else follow the advice of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY] and destroy it, root and branch.

Mr. Chairman, there are three ways in which Government employees can be selected. First, they may be selected in precisely the same way in which the head of a great business establishment selects his subordinates, without any examination, with only those practical tests which are so readily and so easily applied. That may be called the business method. Second, they may be selected upon the recommendation of Senators or Representatives or of men of political influence. That may be called the patronage method. Third, they may be selected from lists of those who have been successful in the open competition prescribed by the act of 1883. This method is denominated briefly by its friends "the merit system." If it were possible to select Government employees by the business method—if, under existing conditions, the heads of Departments or of bureaus could select freely the appointees for whose work they are to be responsible—everyone would agree that the problem had been solved. But everyone with the least knowledge of public affairs knows that this method is unattainable; that the heads of Departments or bureaus, no matter how much discretion in words is given to them by the law, will be pursued by our importunities in favor of our political friends, to which in the end they will yield. They will be responsible for the work, and we shall be responsible for their subordinates, because the selection will be ours and not theirs. Accordingly, then, it is true that we must take our choice between the merit system and the patronage system.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] said in one of his speeches that the supporters of the civil-service system had never undertaken to discuss the subject dispassionately or to approach or touch the true test of the efficiency or nonefficiency of the law. I believe he is mistaken in that assertion. In any event, I propose to discuss it dispassionately, if I am able to do so. I know that I can not in the time which I shall allot myself, or which is allotted to me by the rule of the House, touch upon all the reasons which lead me to believe that the law of 1883 is of inestimable benefit to the country. But I want to call the attention of the House to one single consideration.

I undertake to say that experience shows that under this system there is greater efficiency in the service and a wiser and more economical expenditure of the public money.

We have before us, and I desire to call gentlemen's attention to it, a daily contrast between the two systems. We have here, in the two Houses of Congress, the patronage system in full force. We select our Subordinates—all, or most of them—in accordance with the theory of patronage. How does it work? Does it tend to efficiency in the service and economy in the expenditure of money? As an answer to that question I want to call your attention to some things in this bill. In this very appropriation bill we pay the chief engineer on the Senate side of the Capitol $2,150 per annum and his assistants $1,440 each. On the House side the chief engineer receives a less sum—$1,700 per annum, and his assistants $1,200 each. In the Treasury building yonder the chief engineer receives only $1,400, and his assistants $1,000 and $750, respectively. It costs $1,200 to run an elevator in this building, while a mile and a quarter away, in the Treasury building, and in all the other Departments in the city, we can obtain the same service for $720 and $660, respectively.

We all know that the comparison can easily be carried further. I remember very well what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] said in the last Congress. He remarked, in substance—I do not undertake to quote his words exactly—"We have three times the number of employees we need; but under present conditions, while human nature is human nature, we can not help it."

Now, let me not be misunderstood. The two Houses of Congress are political bodies, and it is proper that they should choose their subordinates as they please. Neither do I find any particular fault with the great difference in salaries. A man who holds his office by the slight tenure of political favor ought to receive more pay than one who holds it as long as he renders efficient service. The moral which I seek to draw is that the patronage system costs more, and if it were extended to all Departments of the Government there would be an enormous waste of the public money.

More than this, the patronage system tends to keep people in office after the need of their service has passed away, or to get them into office (as was remarked by the gentleman from Illinois in this House) when there is no need of their service at all. Further, when the decrease of public work becomes so marked that it is indecent to keep them longer in the service, the patronage system tends to keep in the service those who are least qualified to remain. In the hearings before the committee we had two pieces of striking testimony in support of these views, and I desire to call the attention of the House to them. Mr. Carroll D. Wright told us that when he was Superintendent of the Eleventh Census, and the work under that Bureau was diminishing, he sought to make discharges from his force. With the aid and on consultation with the chiefs of divisions he would select fifty men who were deemed to be least capable, and he would send their names to his superior officers.

The final result would be that those fifty incapables would be retained in office because they had political support, while the men and women who were efficient, but were without political support, had to be discharged in their places. And in private conversation Mr. Wright said to me that the worst clerks in the whole service under him were those who had to be retained until the very end.

A still more striking piece of testimony was furnished by the Commissioner of Pensions, Mr. Evans, whom no one will accuse of being too friendly to the merit system. In the committee we had decided to make appropriations for the full amount asked for the clerical service in the Pension Bureau. But we thought the amount large; and in accordance with a suggestion of some gentlemen on the committee, Mr. Evans was sent for again. He was asked whether he could not reduce his force. He hesitated a long time and finally said, "Yes, I can reduce my force by 100 clerks if you will let me select those clerks."

But he said: "You know that can not be done. When I assume to select, or attempt to select, clerks for discharges, then the political pressure for retention will begin to come." And I here use his exact words: "People who have the least merit for doing work have the most influence, and they spend their time in getting influence." Thus we see the patronage system working side by side with the merit system, to the detriment of the public service.

Mr. SULLOWAY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if these are not all under what is known as the merit system?

Mr. MOODY. They are; but I am talking now of the patronage system—a very different question. I am trying to show how it works, and have been endeavoring to demonstrate the fact that one-half of the evil arising from the merit system grows out of the fact that the remaining traces of the patronage system still in force embarrass the work.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not desire, and certainly do not intend, to accuse others of using political pressure with a view to acquitting myself. We all do it, and we shall continue to do it, no doubt, as long as any traces of the theory of patronage remain in existence.

But let me call your attention in this connection to another illustration. When this Administration came into power, the monthly salary roll paid to the subordinates in the Immigration Bureau in New York amounted to $11,000. Under the last Administration all of the Republicans had been removed from that Bureau; there had been a clean sweep and their places filled with Democrats; and by an order of the then President it was placed under the civil-service rules. Accordingly, when this Administration came in, those persons then in the service of the Government at New York had no political pressure to retain them in office.

What has been the result? The result is that it was seen that this office could be administered, just as efficiently as it had been administered before, with a very much reduced force. Discharges were made and the monthly salary was cut down from $11,000 to $8,000. Does anyone doubt, if we had been able to fill these places with men who had been able to render political services to the Republican party, that they would not have been filled? But the merit system stood in the way, and in this instance, as well as in many others that could be cited, we see the great benefit to the public Treasury.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that this process is going on all over the country. I think myself it will result eventually in a great saving of the public money and the reduction of the burdens upon the public Treasury.

There are two provisions in this bill intended to exact from the clerks in the various Departments here in the city of Washington a larger return for the money paid to them, which, in my opinion, never could have passed the House under the old system. These are, first, the abolition of the thirty days' sick leave, heretofore granted, and the requirement that when the work of any bureau is behind, the clerks shall be made to work overtime in order to catch up. And we are enabled to pass these provisions because we are no longer the patrons of those in the Departments at Washington, and they are no longer our clients. We are, as we ought to be, at arm's length. We can treat every Department of the Government with firmness and justice.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. MOODY. Certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. I would like to ask the gentleman if this law to which he refers (the sick-leave provision of the law) has not been incorporated in the appropriation bills since 1883 and since the merit system went in force?

Mr. MOODY. I am not able to answer the gentleman's question as to the exact date. I do not know. But whether it did or not, I do not see the relevancy of the suggestion. I do not care how it came in, it ought to be put out.

Mr. PEARSON. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will yield to me for an instant, I desire to ask him this plain question—whether he holds that the civil service of the United States costs more or less now than it did in 1883?

Mr. MOODY. I do not hold on that question one way or the other. It is a question of fact, which the figures can demonstrate. I have no doubt that it costs more——

Mr. PEARSON. Sixty-eight million dollars more.

Mr. MOODY (continuing). But if the gentleman will examine the figures a little more carefully, he will find that there has been a very great increase in membership.

Mr. PEARSON. I have the figures before me, but as I will have an opportunity of making some response to the gentleman, I will not occupy his time now. I will, however, avail myself hereafter of an opportunity of quoting the figures.

Mr. MOODY. I have the figures, but I have not got them in my mind and can not quote them; but I undertake to say that I have stated to the House the substance and effect of them.

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG]?

Mr. MOODY. I do; certainly.

Mr. QUIGG. I should like to make some inquiries with regard to the appropriation, if the moment is opportune. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman's argument.

Mr. MOODY. With regard to the particular appropriation?

Mr. QUIGG. With regard to the appropriation.

Mr. MOODY. I did not intend to refer to that, but I would as lief answer the question now as at any time.

Mr. DOCKERY. I beg to suggest to the gentleman from New York that it is exceedingly inopportune to the matter under consideration. [Laughter.]

Mr. QUIGG. I want to ask the gentleman if this appropriation this year is not precisely the same as last year?

Mr. MOODY. I understand so.

Mr. QUIGG. The recommendations of the commission for additional service were not adopted by the committee?

Mr. MOODY. They were not.

Mr. QUIGG. Now, is it not a fact that the sum appropriated for the support of the Civil Service Commission is entirely misleading as to the amount of money which the Civil Service Commission actually expends for clerk hire and other things?

Mr. MOODY. It is, as in so many other branches of the service.

Mr. QUIGG. Is it not the fact that the commission has in the neighborhood of fifty clerks who are brought into its service by details from other branches?

Mr. MOODY. I think that is approximately correct in respect to the number. I am not quite sure.

Mr. QUIGG. Now I want to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts what authority of law there is for these details?

Mr. MOODY. Well, the general authority which permits details from one Department to another all through the service here in Washington, and the specific authority which is contained in the act of 1883.

Mr. QUIGG. May I inquire if the gentleman refers in that answer to the third section of the act?

Mr. MOODY. I do.

Mr. QUIGG. Well, does not that simply allow details to the members of boards of examiners?

Mr. MOODY. Yes; details for purposes of examination. I am not quite sure about the exact language.

Mr. QUIGG. I just want to get at what the committee think to be the law on the subject.

Mr. MOODY. Yes.

Mr. QUIGG. The language is this:

> The commission shall, at Washington and in one or more places in each State and Territory where examinations are to take place, designate and select a suitable number of persons, not less than three, in the official service of the United States, residing in said State or Territory, after consulting the head of the Department or office of which such persons serve, to be members of boards of examiners——

Mr. MOODY. Yes; that is the authority.

Mr. QUIGG. Now, is that the authority under which forty-eight or more clerks are detailed from the various Departments here in Washington to do purely clerical work in the office of the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. MOODY. It is under that statute, and under the general power of transfer which prevails in Washington, under other provisions of law with which I am not at present familiar.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Massachusetts will pardon me for a moment, I think it is under that particular provision that the authority is claimed by the Civil Service Commission to make these calls for details. They do not claim under the general authority.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is true.

Mr. QUIGG. May I inquire of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] whether there is any general provision of law which enables the Civil Service Commission to make demands upon the Departments for clerical service?

Mr. DINGLEY. None beyond what has been read—those two lines.

Mr. QUIGG. None beyond this, in which the law says that they may detail persons to serve as members of boards of examiners?

Mr. DINGLEY. It is under those two lines that all these details have been made.

Mr. QUIGG. Well, now, does the Committee on Appropriations believe this sort of business ought to go on; and is it to this sort of business to which the gentleman from Massachusetts referred a moment ago when he said it made no difference whether we passed this appropriation or whether we do not? Does he mean to say that they are going to continue these transfers?

Mr. MOODY. I shall forget the first of the gentleman's question in listening to the last part——

Mr. QUIGG. Oh, the gentleman will understand it all right. It is perfectly clear.

Mr. MOODY. It is quite long. I do not know whether this law authorizes the wholesale transfer of clerks to this commission.

Mr. QUIGG. That is, to the offices of the Commissioners?

Mr. MOODY. If there is other authority than this law, and I have no doubt that there is not, after hearing the statement of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], in my judgment the authority of this law is stretched beyond its fair meaning; and I expressed myself so in the committee. [Applause.]

Mr. QUIGG. I am glad to hear the gentleman say so. Now, I want to ask the gentleman if what he said—that it did not make any difference——

Mr. MOODY. I have just lifted the act of 1883 to my desk.

Mr. QUIGG. If I understood the gentleman, he said it did not make any difference whether we passed this appropriation or not, and that another member of the committee was going to tell us why it did not make any difference. Now, I wish to ask the gentleman if he referred to the fact, if this commission has stretched the law as he admits, that it is going to have the service whether we pass the appropriation in the bill or not?

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, I do not think I said to the House that my colleague, the gentleman who proposes to discuss this subject, would show that it made no difference whether this was passed or not. If I said so, I did not intend to say that. I will say to the gentleman very freely—and I hope he will not detain me very much longer upon this question—that the striking out of this proposition will either do something or it will not. If it does not cripple the action of the Civil Service Commission, it accomplishes nothing.

If they go on detailing other clerks from other Departments into that commission and collect their own salaries by an action in the Court of Claims, as they may be able to do, then it will go on as it does now. Now, if, on the other hand, the striking out of the appropriation succeeds in crippling the work of the commission, I have been unable to find any way under the law by which appointments to the public service in the classified service could be made, and you would absolutely stop any legal appointments to the public service. Now, I think that will be demonstrated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I am not prepared to discuss this subject, and am not thoroughly familiar with it.

Mr. QUIGG. Why does not the committee make an honest appropriation for this commission and give it the service that it requires, or else provide so that it shall not have that service in an unlawful way?

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, that is one of the conundrums that have been troubling me ever since the 27th of November, when we had the first meeting of the committee. That inquiry does not apply to this particular appropriation only, but to every other appropriation. We are constantly appropriating money for one bureau or department of the service and then we find that it has been expended in other departments, and the constant effort of the Appropriations Committee is to control that and make the department which receives the nominal appropriation of money control the expenditure.

Mr. QUIGG. If the gentleman will allow me, here are two $1,800 clerks, a dozen or more of $1,200 and $1,400 clerks, and a great number of per diem clerks——

Mr. MOODY. Yes.

Mr. QUIGG. Who are being employed here in the office of this commission constantly—in continuous service.

Mr. MOODY. Yes.

Mr. QUIGG. And have been, apparently, for years, and yet we have an appropriation that does not take note of that at all.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, so far as I am concerned, I can not right all the wrongs that have grown up during the time of my predecessors. I found a great many things to complain of that I would like to change.

Mr. DOCKERY. This abuse is not peculiar to the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MOODY. Not at all.

I do not want to leave this branch of the subject before I call attention to the testimony which reaches us of those who have been in charge of the various censuses. Does it amount to nothing that Francis A. Walker, that Robert P. Porter and Carroll D. Wright, the first in charge of the Tenth and the last two in charge of the Eleventh Census, unite in saying to the American people that the employees of the United States Census Bureau should be taken from the classified list?

I would like to have gentlemen listen to a letter written by John Shaw Billings, who was in charge of the department of vital statistics in the Eleventh Census. He says:

> The whole of my work in the census has been done in the face of great obstacles owing to repeated changes of clerks for political reasons, etc., and I am tired of struggling with the most unpropitious circumstances which have surrounded the work.

If we are to believe newspaper reports, a very accomplished gentleman who is suggested for the office of Superintendent of the next census has declined to consider the proposition unless the clerks in that bureau are to be drawn from the classified service.

Mr. QUIGG. The census will not fail on that account.

Mr. MOODY. No, the census will probably not fail on that account. I can find a great many persons qualified to be the head of that bureau between here and the Treasury.

Mr. Chairman, I have not time to go into all the details that I wish to bring to the attention of the committee. Look in whatever quarter you will, you find evidence that the merit system tends, and tends strongly, to efficiency and to economy in the public service. We are trustees of the people's money raised by taxation, and are bound to see to it that it is expended in their interest and not in our own. We have no right to disregard this consideration of economy which comes to us from every quarter.

Mr. KERR. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if he has made an investigation as to what percentage of the present classified service went in under examination or under the law?

Mr. MOODY. Do you mean of the whole service?

Mr. KERR. Of the whole service.

Mr. MOODY. I can not inform the gentleman.

Mr. PEARSON. There are 47,000 who have never been examined and 6,000 who have been; that is, in the departmental service.

Mr. KERR. Another inquiry. How do they arrive at a conclusion as to the increase of efficiency without having some accurate data as to the number of persons that went in by examination and the number that went in by political preferment?

Mr. MOODY. I suppose it is difficult.

Mr. KERR. I should think it would be not only difficult, but impossible.

Mr. MOODY. The question is not so much how a man gets into office, because good men get into office under any system. The question is whether the official shall know, after he gets in, that he can retain his office as long as he renders faithful and efficient service; and when the merit system was adopted as the policy of this country, it gave that assurance to every official under the civil-service law.

Mr. KERR. May I make another inquiry of the gentleman?

Mr. MOODY. Yes, sir.

Mr. KERR. I understand that the law has been in force now for fourteen years, and that hardly 10 per cent of the present service has come in under examination. Now, if the present order against removals continues in force, how long will it take to bring the whole classified service under the civil service?

Mr. MOODY. Well, Mr. Chairman, if the President, or if this Congress, should see fit to adopt the views which I expressed in the early part of my speech, it would not take very long.

Mr. KERR. Well, they have been fourteen years at it now and only 10 per cent yet has gone in under examination.

Mr. MOODY. Well, it would not take fourteen years to submit those who entered the service without examination to some sufficient test; which is what I have suggested.

Mr. KERR. How would that be done if the order against removals continues in force?

Mr. MOODY. The order against removals does not prohibit removals for cause. It does not prohibit removals for inefficiency. As I know, in the Treasury Department, under examinations which have taken place there recently under this Administration, people who have disclosed their inefficiency under examination, people who were appointed under the old system and have proved inefficient, have been separated from the Treasury; and that can be done elsewhere as well as in the Treasury Department.

Before I take my seat, I desire to deal briefly with some complaints which are constantly repeated.

It is said that the action of successive Presidents has extended the classified service far beyond the intent of the Congress which enacted the law. Let us see about that. I know of no better way of ascertaining the intent of the legislators than by examining what is contained within the four corners of the law they enact. The act of 1883 provides for tests of "applicants for the public service now classified or to be classified hereunder."

By section 6 authority is conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury to classify clerks and persons employed by collectors, naval officers, surveyors, or appraisers of all customs districts, or in the public service at their respective offices, or clerks, agents, or persons employed under the Department in any district. The Postmaster-General is given a like authority for clerks and persons employed in the postal service. Heads of Departments and of offices are authorized to classify "subordinate places, clerks, and officers in the public service pertaining to their respective Departments."

This seems broad enough, but it is not all. The authority of the President, under section 1753 of the Revised Statutes, is expressly preserved by section 7. By that section thus in effect reenacted the President can "prescribe such regulations for the admission of persons into the civil service of the United States as may best promote the efficiency thereof and ascertain the fitness of each candidate." From this sweeping provision the act of 1883 excludes only officers not in the executive branch, persons merely employed as laborers or workmen, and persons subject to confirmation by the Senate.

In the exercise of the authority to promulgate rules and classifications the various Presidents have usually if not invariably declared it to be in pursuance of section 1753 of the Revised Statutes as well as of the act of 1883.

It is therefore manifest that the President has the right to put under the control of the civil-service law and rules every position which is in "the civil service of the United States" with the exceptions named. Unless he has gone beyond the fair meaning of those words he has not exceeded the authority conferred upon him by Congress.

Nothing is more common than to hear complaints that the examinations prescribed by the commission are not practical and are not calculated to disclose the qualifications which are needed in those who are about to enter the service. Well, if that is so, it is not the fault of the law. It is the fault of those who administer the law. The law says:

> The examinations shall be practical in their character, and, so far as may be, shall relate to those matters which will fairly test the relative capacity and fitness of the persons examined to discharge the duties of the service into which they seek to be appointed.

If the examinations have departed from that standard they should be constrained to return to it. I have no doubt that examinations can be found here and there which are subject to criticism, but on the whole it seems to me they are well adapted for the end which is sought and that they are not scholastic and difficult except where the nature of the service which the applicant is about to perform requires them to be so. There is a great mass of testimony in the hearings taken before the committee upon that subject. I advise gentlemen to read that testimony before making up their minds. It is often said that the Department ought to make these examinations.

It appeared from the testimony before the committee that the Departments were constantly consulted as to the correct character of the examination, and it appeared that where there was a difference of opinion the appointing officer was the one who dictated and not the commission. Under the law there are some examinations which are difficult, as there should be. Gentlemen say with an air of triumph—the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY] said it the other day—"Why, members of this House, or even the President of the United States, would not be able to pass some of the examinations prescribed by this commission!"

That is very true; of course it is true; and the reason is plain. Members of this House and the President are not competent to fill some places in the civil service. A man may be a great statesman, as great a statesman as my friend from North Carolina, yet not have the qualifications fitting him to be a chemist or a stenographer. Examinations are not intended to bring out the general qualifications of the person examined, but his fitness for the particular place.

Mr. LOW. Whose duty is it to outline the scope of the scholastic examinations?

Mr. MOODY. The practice is that the head of the Department shall do so.

Mr. LOW. In all cases?

Mr. MOODY. In all cases.

Mr. LOW. Is it done in all cases?

Mr. MOODY. It is said to be done in all cases. The opportunity of doing it is given in all cases. I will say to the gentleman from New York that it was stated to us in the committee room that, generally speaking, the Departments were inclined to exact a severer test than the Civil Service Commission itself was inclined to require, and that whenever differences of opinion arose between the two they arose upon that line.

I repeat, that the examinations seem to me to be easy where they ought to be easy, and difficult where they ought to be difficult.

Mr. MAHON. Let me ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether he could hop 40 feet on his right foot?

Mr. MOODY. I do not know whether I could or not.

Mr. MAHON. If not, then you could not get a position in the Printing Office.

Mr. MOODY. Well, I do not want a position in the Printing Office, so that will not trouble me.

Mr. BROSIUS. It is just as well that the statement of my colleague [Mr. MAHON] should be corrected right here. No applicant for any place in the Printing Office is subjected to any examination of that character.

Mr. MAHON. They make the applicants do that.

Mr. BROSIUS. That is not a fact; and my colleague ought to know it, because the statement to that effect has been contradicted a hundred times by those most competent to know.

Mr. MAHON. I will give my colleague the evidence to-morrow.

Mr. BROSIUS. You can not do it.

Mr. MOODY. Without yielding further, I should like to go on with what I have to say.

I do not pretend to a knowledge which would fit me to judge of these examinations. This I do know, that if there is any wrong in them it is a wrong capable of easy righting.

Mr. BUTLER. What remedy would the gentleman from Massachusetts suggest as a method of righting existing wrongs?

Mr. MOODY. Better examinations.

Mr. BUTLER. As the examinations are now conducted under the law, what remedy would the gentleman suggest?

Mr. MOODY. Better administration of the law where there is bad administration.

Mr. BUTLER. How would that be reached?

Mr. MOODY. If there is bad administration, and those administering the law will not correct it, remove them and place people there who will do so. I do not agree to the gentleman's statement. I think the administration of the law in respect to examinations, while subject to criticism here and there, has been constantly improving. I want to say something more on that subject.

I was surprised to find that 16,000 positions, about one-fifth of the total number of classified positions, are not subject to any scholastic test whatever. A man who can not read or write his own name would be able to pass the examination, would be rated simply upon his physical capacity and his experience in the line of duty which he seeks to enter.

Mr. PEARSON. I know the gentleman will not think I am abusing his patience when I ask whether those positions are not positions as laborers and workmen, and whether they are not excluded by the very terms of the law?

Mr. MOODY. Some of them are not, clearly. Without stopping to read it, I ask permission to publish in my remarks a list of the positions as to which the test of reading and writing is not required.

The gentleman must not forget one thing which ought to be kept in mind all the way through this discussion. There is one test of entrance into the public service under the so-called merit system which is practical in the highest degree, and that is the probationary term. Every appointee is required not only to pass the examination, but to prove by six months of actual trial in his work that he is competent. His superior officer may discharge him in one minute or one month, without giving a reason, and he can not be employed in the service permanently until his employer has certified in writing that upon trial he has been found to be satisfactory.

There are many complaints to which I would like to allude in detail, but time forbids me, which if rightly judged would be found to be complaints not against the law, but against its maladministration—maladministration attributable in a large measure to the patronage system which continues to embarrass and impair the working of the public service. I have heard many and bitter complaints of this nature heretofore, and I expect to hear them repeated during the course of this debate. But, Mr. Chairman, I venture to assert that upon an examination it will be found that they relate to those parts of the public service which have been lately placed under the merit system. A change of system is not easy——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOODY. I should like to be permitted to proceed for a few minutes longer.

Mr. DOCKERY. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will have five minutes additional time.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman will proceed.

There was no objection.

Mr. MOODY. I was proceeding to say, Mr. Chairman, that a change of system is not easy. It can not be accomplished without bad administration, without occasional hardship and injustice. This much is, however, to be noticed as universally true: The longer any branch of the service is under the merit system the more efficient it becomes and the less complaint there is about its administration, and at the same time the less political pressure there is for office.

Give to the system in the new branches of the service to which it has been extended the same trial which it has had and successfully survived in the various other branches of the public service throughout the country, where this system has shown its efficiency and practical value.

It may well be that in the effort to extend the operations of the law offices have been brought under it which it would have been wiser to have excepted or which were not within the authority conferred by the statutes. In either of these cases the President has the power to apply the remedy without action on the part of Congress. I believe that he will exercise this power fearlessly and with an eye single to the public interests.

Gentlemen are troubled by what appears to them to be a public sentiment against the law of 1883 and the action of the various Presidents under it. That such a sentiment exists I do not doubt. No man can undertake to measure its extent and its depth. But I believe that it is upon the surface, and when the true voice of the Republican party is heard it will be overwhelming in support of President McKinley and in favor of keeping the solemn pledge which the Republican party has made to the American people. [Applause.]

Under the leave granted by the committee, I append the following extract from the report of the General Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service:

MAIL DISTRIBUTED.

There were 6,059,769,680 pieces of first-class mail matter handled during the year just closed, and 5,511,771,000 pieces of second, third, and fourth class matter, making a total of 11,571,540,680 pieces, exclusive of registered matter. Of the latter class of matter there were handled 14,640,832 packages and cases, 984,093 through registered pouches and 631,738 inner registered sacks, making in all 16,256,663 pieces of registered matter. There were also handled 462,469,640 pieces of city mail.

The increase of ordinary mail handled over last year was 405,217,440 pieces, or 3.7 per cent; a decrease of 329,943, or 2.2 per cent, in the number of single pieces of registered matter, and an increase of 150,436, or 10.2 per cent, in the number of through registered pouches and inner registered sacks handled, which explains the decrease in the number of single packages handled. The amount of city mail handled exceeded that of last year by 54,402,440, or 13.3 per cent.

The following table will show the number of clerks assigned to lines, the amount of mail handled, the number of errors in distribution, with the per cent of increase or decrease, for a period of ten years:

Year ended June 30—	Number of clerks.a	Per cent of increase in clerks.	Pieces of mail matter distributed.	Per cent of increase.	Errors in distribution.	Per cent.		Pieces correct to each error.	Per cent.

a Acting clerks not included in this table.

From this it will be seen that while the amount of mail handled has increased 77.2 per cent in ten years, the working force required to do the work has increased but 48.6 per cent and the pieces of mail matter handled correctly to each error in distribution has increased from 3,694 to 11,960.

CIVIL SERVICE—PROMOTION.

I see no reason in the experience of the past year to change my opinion, so often expressed, as to the beneficial effect upon the service of a system of appointments based upon efficiency, as determined by proper examinations, both mental and physical. The records of the service, as shown by the accompanying tables and as summarized in the text, speak for themselves, and indicate beyond question that the personnel of the service has in no wise deteriorated. So satisfactory has been our experience in this respect that it was determined to apply the rules, as far as practicable, to promotions in the service.

The matter was given the most careful consideration by a committee composed of experienced Railway Mail Service officials, and as a result of their deliberations a set of regulations governing promotions was promulgated in February last, and all promotions since that time have been made in accordance with those regulations. Some little difficulties have arisen, some inconsistencies have been discovered, but on the whole the system has proven successful, and is undoubtedly a step in the right direction. In the course of time all the difficulties will be overcome, all the inconsistencies will be remedied, and all causes for criticism which have existed in the past will be removed. Each clerk can rest under the assurance that when his record entitles him to promotion, favoritism or influence will not bar such promotion.

When a vacancy occurs in any class on any line in the service, the division superintendent certifies to the board of promotion (consisting of the general superintendent, the assistant general superintendent, and the chief clerk of the service) the full records of all the clerks in the next lower class on that line who are eligible for promotion. Any clerk who, within three years last past, has made a case examination record of 95 per cent or better on the distribution assigned him is eligible.

A clerk's record shows his age, term of service, length of service both on line and in his present class, all examinations passed within three years, errors in distribution for one year, and general rating—covering habits, attendance, application, adaptability, health and physical condition, military record, if any, and whether the clerk has ever been injured in the service. All of these records are carefully scrutinized by the board of promotion, and the three clerks having the highest general records are certified to the Postmaster-General, who selects one of the three for promotion.

I also append a letter from the acting president of the Civil Service Commission as to the number of classified positions for which no scholastic test is given:

DECEMBER 14, 1897.

SIR: In response to a request from you by telephone, this date, the commission has the honor to advise you that an estimate based upon reports from the Departments shows the number of classified positions for which no scholastic test is given as approximately 16,000, with following designations:

Blacksmith, cabinetmaker, carpenter, coachman, cook, decorator, general mechanic, hardener, hostler, knife grinder, laundress, leather worker, locksmith, machinist, mason, miller, painter, plasterer, plate cleaner, plate printer, plumber, roller maker, sailmaker, sawyer, steam fitter, stonecutter, tailor, teamster, transferrer, wheelwright, locomotive engineer, switchman, fireman (except in the custodian service), oiler, portrait and vignette engraver, hospital attendant, surfman, pupil nurse, boatman, certain classified laborers, and light keepers.

Engineer Department at large: Deputy inspector and master, deputy inspector and pilot, deputy inspector and mate, master, pilot, mate, engineer of steam vessels, and similar positions where licenses are required by the Office of Steamboat Inspection, inspectors receiving $1,200 or less per annum who are not appointed through examination, baker, blacksmith, blaster, boarding master receiving $75 per month or less, boatman and steersman receiving $900 per annum or less, boiler master, bricklayer, calker, carpenter, cement finisher, cement tester, cement worker, chain man, concrete finisher, craneman, dredge runner, to include engineer for dredging, elevator conductor, gardener, gauge reader, instrument men receiving $900 or less per annum, master laborer, leadsman receiving $600 per annum or less, lock master receiving $1,720 per annum or less, lock and bridge tender, machinist, mason, master quarryman, master mechanic, master mason, master carpenter, master stonecutter, master bricklayer, master weaver of mats, motor man (to include all steam engineers not licensed engineers), overseer receiving $900 or less, painter, pile driver receiving $720 or less, pipe fitter, plumber, powder man, recorder receiving $480 or less, rigger, rodsman receiving $75 or less per month, sheet-iron worker, ship carpenter, stadia man, steward receiving $75 per month or less, stonecutter, striker, telegraph and telephone lineman, helper to blacksmith, helper to calker, helper to carpenter, helper to machinist, watchman, and any similar position.

Ordnance Department at large: Steam engineer and machinist, locomotive engineer, engine man, fireman, machinist, pattern maker, blacksmith, painter, tool maker, screw maker, file cutter, case hardener, temperer, engraver, die sinker, filer, vitrioler, polisher, rigger, piper, case maker, tinsmith, plumber, saddler, wheelwright, hammersman, boiler tender, steam engineer, engineer (not civil or mechanical), assistant steam engineer, electrician, mechanic, carpenter, smith, printer, mason, gauge maker, cutter, browner, bluer, harness maker, tool grinder, wheelman, steam and gas fitter, melter, millwright, molder, tinner, weigher, farrier, bolt maker, heater, rotary filer, foreman, assistant foreman, inspector, assistant to inspector of ordnance, assistant in experimental firing, assistant inspector, assistant machinist, assistant smith, forge master, assistant millwright, assistant piper, steam-hammer driver, skilled laborer, messenger, guard, and watchman.

Applicants for these positions are rated solely upon the elements of experience and physical ability, the former counting 80 per cent and the latter 20 per cent of the test.

Very respectfully,

JOHN B. HARLOW,
Acting President.

Hon. WILLIAM H. MOODY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire at this time to occupy but a very few moments.

I confess to some degree of confusion in view of the assault which comes from the other side of the House upon the civil-service law, a law to which the Republican party, by all of its recent national platforms, has been distinctly committed. I am somewhat confused also by the fact that the discussion, so far as it has progressed, has been upon a paragraph involving only an appropriation for the maintenance and execution of the civil-service law.

It may be well for the country to understand that the only proposition now pending is one to execute the existing law by the usual appropriation. It may be well for the people to know that under the rules of the House, adopted by the Republican majority, no proposition to repeal this law is in order at this time. It may be well also for the people to know that under the rules of the House, adopted by the same Republican majority, it is not in order to offer a proposition to modify or amend the law. It will, therefore, in view of these indisputable facts, occasion some surprise to the people whom these Republican gentlemen represent when they know why the time of the House and of the country is thus frittered away in useless and pointless debate.

An assortment of views have already been expressed on the other side in this debate, but of what avail are they now? It may be true, sir, that there are Republican "boys" at home who fought in the "trenches," who carried banners and shouted for "McKinley and prosperity," who have not yet received a post-office or any other similar recognition by the Administration. It is within the limits of probability, therefore, that the "dress-parade" debate now going on is for the purpose of advising those at home who followed the fortunes of the Republican party that there is a barrier in the way of appointment to places in the public service.

Indeed, it is obvious that the debate is had for the purpose of explaining to Republican constituencies that under existing law "nothing can be done for them," and that the trouble in the way is the civil-service law.

But, sir, be that as it may, there are grave public questions that should now challenge the attention of this House. The Senate resolution according to the struggling Cubans belligerent rights sleeps in the files of this House, without the hope of favorable recognition.

And yet, sir, I believe the overwhelming masses of all parties in this country would be anxious to see this debate stopped long enough to pass the Senate resolution recognizing the belligerent rights of the patriots of Cuba. [Applause.]

There are also grave questions incidental to the reform of the currency clamoring for consideration. The Secretary of the Treasury, with a boldness to be admired, although we distrust his wisdom, invites the attention of his party to the fact that the gold standard, as required by the Republican national platform, must be still more firmly established. And yet, with that declaration ringing in their ears, Republican Representatives evade the great question of currency reform to take up what seems to them the more important issue of civil-service reform, at a time when it is known the rules forbid repeal, amendment, or modification.

I shall not now discuss the question of civil-service reform. I am a member of that committee and will defer comment until a later period. If, however, gentlemen on the other side are sincere, I have no doubt that a majority of that committee will at an early date submit for consideration a bill either repealing the civil-service law or modifying it, or amending it so that they can oust the few Democrats who are still in office, because that seems to be the purpose of the Republican party. But, Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a plain business statement in this connection. The civil-service law is upon the statute books. The Committee on Appropriations, as required by law, reported the appropriation.

Now, then, if the appropriation is stricken out, its effect will be to leave the Civil Service Commissioners in office; and under a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States they will go to the Court of Claims and secure their salaries, and no one can prevent it. Not only this, but under a construction of that commission, which has been sustained by the Departments—I agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] that it is a strained one—details from the Departments can still be made, although Congress should fail to make the usual provision for a clerical force. So that, if the majority succeed in striking out the appropriation, the Civil Service Commissioners will still draw their salaries and a clerical force will still be provided under section 3 of the organic act relating to the civil service.

But, Mr. Chairman, if the proposition to refuse the appropriation is effective, the Republican party will have stricken down the only provision of law under which appointments can be made in the classified service of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, this is not a manly method of assault. If the existing civil-service law is objectionable—and I concur in that view—then, with that boldness and audacity which formerly characterized the Republican party, bring in a bill repealing the law and go to the American people upon that platform. I do not speak for anyone on this side of the House except myself.

At this time I do not propose to discuss the main question; but I do say that the life tenure, in American politics, is odious to the masses of the American people. [Applause.] And there was no more popular plank in the last national Democratic platform than that which declared against that tenure of office.

I do not propose at this time to offer any suggestions to help our Republican friends out of their embarrassment; but if the Republican party intends to maintain the civil-service law, it might be done along the lines of the following bill. I will read it:

That on and after July 1, 1898, the appointment of all persons within the classified service of the United States shall be for a term of six years, and no person then in said service, or who may be hereafter appointed therein, shall continue in the service longer than the said term of six years from the date of his or her appointment.

The tenure of office herein specified shall be construed to cover the whole service of all persons within the said classified service, whether the same be included in one or more grades, branches, or departments thereof: Provided, That at the expiration of the term of service herein prescribed persons who have not attained the age of 70 years shall be eligible to reappointment in the same grades in which they last served, or in other grades of the classified service, under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe: Provided further, That persons to whom this act applies, who shall have been in the classified service six years or more on the 1st day of July, 1898, may be temporarily continued therein, in the discretion of the head of the Department, for a period not exceeding one year from said date.

Mr. Chairman, there are two propositions involved in the bill. The first is hostility to a life tenure. The bill fixes a definite tenure. The second provides that persons who have reached the age of 70 years shall not be eligible for reappointment. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not commit myself to that measure, but I submit it in the hope that it may be of some service to the weary Republican Representatives who are trying to reconcile the disgruntled Republican patriots at home who have failed to secure office. This "fire in the rear" is doubtless the explanation of the growing hostility to civil service which finds expression in this debate. But, Mr. Chairman, if the civil-service policy is to be maintained, I do believe that some bill constructed along these lines would benefit the public service, because it would operate to forbid a civil pension roll. The people are opposed to a life tenure and a civil pension list. Both are pernicious, and a bill framed along the lines of hostility to both would greatly improve the atmosphere of the public service.

Mr. QUIGG. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly.

Mr. QUIGG. When I was asking questions of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] with regard to the frauds that appear to exist in the Civil Service Commission Office in the shape of clerks detailed from various other Departments, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] said, if I understood him, that this situation was not unique.

Mr. DOCKERY. Words to that effect.

Mr. QUIGG. But that this Committee on Appropriations was continually appropriating for one office and finding that the money was being expended in another.

Can you give any information about that state of affairs, and how far it extends?

Mr. DOCKERY. That is a custom, I will state to the gentleman, that has grown up under all administrations of the civil service and in all the Departments, and the Committee on Appropriations have sought strenuously to remedy it. First, Congress enacted a law requiring the heads of Departments to submit in their annual estimates the number of clerks thus detailed and who had been absent from the office beyond one year.

Finally Congress adopted a remedy that in all probability will cure it by prohibiting the detail of any clerk for a longer period than one hundred and twenty days, and that detail can not be renewed except by a written order of the head of the Department. We find upon examination that the law has operated well and has greatly curtailed the abuse of which the gentleman from New York has justly complained.

How much time have I consumed?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed twelve minutes.

Mr. DOCKERY. I yield twenty minutes to my colleague from Missouri [Mr. ROBB].

Mr. ROBB. Mr. Chairman, the Republican party opposes the double standard, but seems to favor double dealing—that of promising one thing and doing the other. And their promises in relation to their fulfillment, stand at about the ratio of 16 to 1. We find them constantly veering from one position to the other—from a declaration in favor of bimetallism by international agreement, to an effort to more firmly fasten upon us the single gold standard; from a declaration in favor of the civil-service law, to an effort to overturn or modify it for partisan purposes; from a declaration in favor of Cuban independence, to an almost cruel neglect of those people. If the violation and disregard of party platforms and party pledges, were the only offenses; if law, precedents, and the solemn enactments of the Government were not lightly considered, and in many cases openly and notoriously trampled upon and plain statutes set at naught, there might for the time being be more substance in the pending discussion of this civil-service law. With the practice of, applying or refusing to apply it; extending or contracting it in its operation agreeable to the whim or desire of the party in power or the officer in charge, the difference in the effect between the so-called reforming of the law and its complete repeal, would not seem to be as great as one might at first have supposed.

With or without a reformation of the law; with or without its repeal, around the "festal board" of official life are gradually but surely gathered in, those in touch and in sympathy with the party in power. With many, it is true, it is a forlorn hope, and they are driven hence to battle against the pangs of their own disappointment and to reap the rewards, if not of "party," at least of individual "perfidy." But there should be no cloak in the shape of a civil-service law, or any other law, to cover up any system of wrongdoing, and no law should remain upon the statute books admitting of such latitude of construction as permits of individuals under the same conditions, being and not being qualified for official preferment.

If the expectations of party followers have been too great; if the promises and pledges of party leaders have been too prolix, the sting of disappointment can not be appeased, and should not be, under cover of one of those automatic laws about which we have recently heard so much. I am of those who believe that party platforms should not be used as instruments to mislead and deceive, but should be lived up to; that the laws should be administered as we find them and in accordance with their spirit and intent, and that truth and honor should maintain among all men, whether in public or private life. And I am as firmly of the opinion that party loyalty is deserving of party preferment.

If given an opportunity, I shall vote for the repeal of the civil-service law, and that having been accomplished, I will look forward with renewed anticipations, to the glory of that day, and the grandeur and magnificence of this Government, when every engine of its mighty machinery shall be fired with the spirit of liberty, and every cog and wheel and rod and axle shall be lubricated by Democratic energy and kept in place by Democratic honor. That day will come, and come quickly, Mr. Chairman; for the American people are intelligent and they are honest; they are imbued with a sense of justice and right and fair dealing, and will not long tolerate hypocrisy and deception and the violation of solemn pledges by any party or any set of men.

Mr. Chairman, we witnessed but recently, one of the most remarkable and sublime spectacles in the history of political struggles in this country. A great party and a great people, while in power, as it were, turning aside its accredited leaders at the risk of defeat, repudiating them for the sake of a principle which they had violated. Though the career of that party has been one of splendid achievements and matchless statesmanship; though its devotion to principles which are just has been its vitalizing power from its foundation, nothing is more sublime or a more enduring testimony of its incorruptibility and the immutability of its principles than the speedy, determined, and unmistakable terms in which it declared its adherence to the fundamental ideas of its organization—the fundamental principles of our Government. It is, in deed, in truth, and in spirit the "great party of the people."

Mr. Chairman, have we aught but cause for congratulations to the country and words of good cheer to the hosts of Democracy, with the spectacle as presented by the majority party in this House? The assurances coming from the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] that repeal would be disastrous, that no man can be a Republican and be a spoilsman; and the no less earnest appeal coming from the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY] for a repeal of the law, and with the warning that if it was not done that there would not be enough of them left at the next election to grease a gimlet to bore the hole to put them in.

Well, that would be a most fortunate condition for us to contemplate—the Republican party without grease, and caring nothing for office for the sake of office. Why, they would not even make it interesting. With these apparent different conceptions of different understandings, the only argument therefore that now remains in favor of continuing the law, is the expediency of gratifying a sentiment, and keeping up an outward appearance of a condition that is unreal, and of a practice that does not exist.

It would more comport with the dignity of the American people to get rid of a law so easily and so frequently evaded; and it is of far less consequence to us that the majority party in this Hous may see fit to set aside their party platform in this respect, than in many other instances in which they have seen proper to disregard it. But, Mr. Chairman, there is another question, which has enlisted the sympathy and the deep concern of every liberty-loving citizen in our country, and which has more than once been a subject of consideration by the legislative and administrative departments of our Government. I refer to the Cuban question. More than a year and a half ago the Republican party in its national platform declared that—

> The Government of Spain having lost control of Cuba, and being unable to protect the property or lives of resident American citizens, or to comply with its treaty obligations, we believe that the Government of the United States should actively use its influence and offices to restore peace and give independence to the island.

Who is here now as the representative of that party seeking to give effect to that declaration? Where is the one among your number who has or will raise his voice in answer to the cry for liberty and the wail of suffering and starving humanity? Where are those of you who will join us on this side of the House in bringing before it at the earliest possible moment the resolution of the Senate, passed at the last session, recognizing belligerent rights to the insurgent Cubans?

What has intervened between then and now occasioning this inaction on your part, on so important a question? Why delay longer in the fulfillment of that solemn pledge, which you published to the world, and assurance of support, to the unhappy people of that unfortunate island?

Situated within less than 100 miles of us; washed by the same waters that wash our shores; embracing a territory of vast prairies, of fertile fields, stretching 800 miles in length by 80 miles in breadth; lying like a gem in the ocean expanse, and in sight almost of this "land of the free and home of the brave," it is but natural that her people should have caught the inspiration of our institutions, and become imbued with that unquenchable desire to breathe the air of freedom.

In the progress of accomplishing this end, a conflict has been waged, characterized on the one side by all the courage, endurance, and generalship of the ancient Greeks, and on the other, by the most inhuman methods of the most barbaric ages. Whether, indeed, the methods which have been adopted by the contending forces have given to the conflict the dignity of modern warfare; whether, indeed, in the midst of the carnage and the desolation which has ensued civil authority, organized and perfected in every particular, has been attained, it is nevertheless a war; a war of savage brutality and unexampled cruelty; a war so momentous in its consequences that it threatens the extermination of an entire people, and the destruction of every productive industry of that once prosperous country. The heroism of that band of patriots; the skill, the ability, the courage, and the manhood with which they have conducted themselves under the most trying conditions; their devotion to a principle—a principle which has lighted the pathway of centuries—has demonstrated over and over again their ability for self-government.

Mr. Chairman, the velvety glove of diplomacy has suffered, if not encouraged, as a means of subjugating the insurgents, a systematic and deliberate course of starvation; and appeals emanating from the head of our Government to the charitable instincts of our people, whilst denying them of the political power and assurances of their Government, which the laws of God, of man, and of nations has given them, does not fulfill the measure of their duty, or the duty and responsibility of this proud Republic.

If I have read with understanding, the recognition of what is called belligerency is the recognition of a fact, that fact being that a civil conflict exists in a foreign state; and the reasons for the exercise of this power are that the rights and interests of the declaring country, are so far affected as to require it to define its position. It is also sometimes put upon humanitarian grounds. The effect of the recognition is to give to the insurgents a recognized status, and the opportunities and privileges accorded under international law. But it is not, if justified by the situation, necessarily an unfriendly act toward the parent State.

Mr. Chairman, it has been said that "a good cause and a good will, animate men to struggle in proportion to the size of their wrongs and the grossness of their oppressors." The Cuban struggle goes on and is unabated. Propositions of autonomy are rejected as insincere, and as concessions obtained at too dear a cost; nothing but absolute independence will terminate the war. The recognition of belligerency by this Government under these circumstances, however construed or in whatever light it might be considered, is a duty it owes to its own citizens; it is a duty it owes to the contending parties, and it is a duty it owes to the peace of the world.

It is a duty which justice and the noblest instincts of humanity demand should be discharged without hesitation or further delay, in keeping with that dignity and firmness which belong to our glorious career as a nation and our preeminent position in the councils of freedom. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Before the gentleman begins, my colleague [Mr. DOCKERY] requested me to reserve the remainder of his time, as he was called over to the Senate.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri will be reserved.

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Chairman, when this question was last under discussion, in December, the following colloquy took place. I read from the RECORD of December 15:

> Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I will hear the gentleman's question in a moment.
> Mr. PEARSON. Does not the gentleman know that the chairman of the Committee on Civil Service Reform of this House and of this Congress has drawn up a very elaborate bill establishing a civil pension by a fund to be contributed by the employees in the civil service?
> Mr. BROSIUS. That is not correct.
> Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I can answer the gentleman. I know that the chairman has not done so.

I had no opportunity, of course, Mr. Chairman, to make a reply at that time.

Mr. BROSIUS. May I inquire of my colleague upon the committee whether he has read from the RECORD the original statement that was made?

Mr. PEARSON. The gentleman is a lawyer. I will pass the RECORD to him.

Mr. BROSIUS. I am satisfied with your statement, if you read from the RECORD. If that statement was made as my friend has just read it, then I did not hear the statement he made, because I heard nothing about a fund to be deducted from the salaries of the officials. The statement that I heard my friend from North Carolina make, and which I questioned on the spot, was that I had introduced a bill providing for a civil pension for the clerks in the Departments, which I instantly denied.

Mr. PEARSON. The gentleman was so swift in his denial that perhaps the gentleman did not get my full statement, but I read from the RECORD, and there can be no dispute about the words that I used or the words that he used.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Will the gentleman permit me? I have just entered the Chamber.

Mr. PEARSON. I suppose I shall have to yield to the gentleman before I get through, and I had better do so now.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I have just entered the Chamber and did not hear precisely what the gentleman read. I should like to know if it is true that the gentleman has not read all I said on that occasion.

Mr. PEARSON. It would require great patience on the part of the House to hear read all that the gentleman did say on that occasion.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Not at all; that which is pertinent to the matter under inquiry was stated by me immediately after the portion of my interruption to which the gentleman has referred.

Mr. PEARSON. If the gentleman will possess his soul in patience a sufficient length of time I shall read it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I am not asking the gentleman to do that. But he should state all that I said before he can determine what I said, and he can not do so by stating a part of what I said.

Mr. PEARSON. I will read the other portion.

Mr. BROSIUS. What is the date of it?

Mr. PEARSON. December 15. The gentleman from Pennsylvania and myself will never have a dispute about a question of fact. (Reading:)

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I can answer the gentleman. I know that the chairman has not done so. I know that there is a bill pending here in some of the committees providing that there shall be deducted from the pay of the clerks a certain amount of money monthly, which is to go to them when they reach an advanced period in life. That does not pension them, but I am opposed to it, and I say that I am confident no such bill as that can pass this House, or can pass the Senate, or can obtain the sanction of the Executive, or be placed upon the statute books of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. That is sufficient. That is the part of my statement to which I referred.

Mr. PEARSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, in justice to myself, as my word was disputed on that occasion both by the gentleman from Indiana and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the evidence I produce in support of my statement is very simple; it is the bill itself, which, with the permission of the committee, I shall have inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. BROSIUS. Will the gentleman please read the title of the bill to the House?

Mr. PEARSON. The title is as follows:

For the retirement of Government employees in the classified civil service.

The bill provides for a compulsory assessment upon employees in the classified service and for the application of that money to what is called a retirement fund. But I submit to my friend from Pennsylvania that he would have been more candid, more ingenuous, more absolutely fair if he had given the real purpose in the title of his bill, for he knows that the retirement fund is a pension. And here is a gentleman from New York who has introduced a bill for the same purpose, pursuing the same methods, making the same provisions, but who calls his measure a "bill for the purpose of pensioning persons in the civil service." The gentleman from Pennsylvania would have been much more ingenuous if he had used the words which would have properly expressed the effect of his proposition.

Mr. BROSIUS. My friend will be fair, I know. My friend from North Carolina knows very well that a deduction from the salaries of clerks for the purpose of retiring them is not a pension, because if he will consult any English dictionary ever published he will be informed that a pension is a bounty given by the government, and is paid by the people, while a retiring fund, paid by the clerks themselves, is not a pension; and that is why I denied the gentleman's statement the other day.

Mr. PEARSON. The gentleman is a French scholar as well as a Latin scholar, and he knows what the meaning of "pension" is, and the etymology of the word. There can be no dispute about what it means. It is a payment or bounty to a person who is retired for one cause or another from any employment, and is usually in the form of a fixed annuity.

A bill (H. R. 516) for the retirement of Government employees in the classified civil service.

[Introduced by Mr. BROSIUS.]

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, beginning with the 1st day of July, 1897, 2 per cent of the salary of every employee in the classified civil service of the Government shall be withheld and shall be deducted from his or her monthly pay, and shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the civil-service retirement fund; and the money so deposited shall constitute a fund which shall be known as the civil-service retirement fund, and which shall be held in trust by the Secretary of the Treasury to be expended for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service of the Government and for certain expenses in connection therewith.

SEC. 2. That at stated periods to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, at least once annually, the unexpended balance of money to the credit of the said civil-service retirement fund, or so much thereof as in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury will not be required for the purposes of this act during the ensuing period, shall be by him invested in interest-bearing bonds of the United States, which, when so purchased, shall become assets belonging to the said fund and the interest on which shall be credited to the said fund, as an increment thereof: Provided, That such bonds may be sold whenever it shall become necessary in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury to procure funds for the purposes of this act, and the proceeds of such sales shall form part of the cash in the said fund and shall be available for all the purposes of this act.

SEC. 3. That on and after July 1, 1901, the employees in the classified civil service of the Government shall be retired from duty, as hereafter provided, and when so retired shall be entitled to receive from the said civil-service retirement fund, in monthly payments, an annual retired payment equal to 75 per cent of the highest pay received at any time while in the civil service of the Government.

First. Every person in the classified civil service who shall have been employed in the civil service for a period of twenty years and who shall have become physically or mentally disabled for the performance of his or her ordinary official duty may be retired upon his or her application, or may be compulsorily retired, and when retired shall be entitled to receive from the said fund the retired payment hereinbefore provided: Provided, That the said period of twenty years shall be computed from the original employment of such person in the civil service of the Government, whether as a classified or unclassified employee, and may include service in one or more Departments of the Government, and periods of service at different times, with an interval during which such person was not in the service, may be computed together so as to constitute a total service of twenty years: And provided further, That in cases of mental disability an application for retirement may be made by the next friend or guardian of any person who shall be declared non compos mentis.

Second. Every person in the classified civil service who shall attain the age of 60 years and shall have been employed in the civil service for a period of thirty years may be retired upon his or her application, and when retired shall be entitled to receive from the said fund the retired payment hereinbefore provided: Provided, That the said period of thirty years shall be computed in the same manner as herein provided for computing the period of twenty years in the preceding paragraph.

Third. Every person in the classified civil service who shall attain the age of 70 years and shall have been employed in the civil service thirty-five years shall be compulsorily retired, and, when retired, shall be entitled to receive from the said fund the retired payment hereinbefore provided: Provided, That the said period of thirty-five years shall be computed in the same manner as herein provided for the period of twenty years in the preceding paragraph next but one.

SEC. 4. That applications for voluntary retirement under the provisions of this act shall be made to the United States Civil Service Commission by the employee seeking such retirement, or by his next friend in his behalf in cases of mental disability, and applications for the compulsory retirement of any employee shall be made to the United States Civil Service Commission by the head of the Executive Department in or under which such employee shall be employed. And the said the United States Civil Service Commission is hereby empowered, and it shall be the duty of the said commission, to hear and determine all applications for voluntary and compulsory retirement and to make suitable regulations for the filing of such applications and for the keeping of full and accurate records of its action thereon. And the said United States Civil Service Commission shall certify the retirement of each person retired by it under the provisions of this act to the head of the Executive Department in or under which such employee shall be employed, and shall also certify the same to the Secretary of the Treasury as the trustee of the said civil-service retirement fund; and such certification shall entitle the person so retired to receive from the said fund the retired payment hereinbefore provided, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall forthwith cause the name of every such person to be placed upon the retirement roll of the said fund, and shall make monthly payments from the said fund to him or her during the remainder of his or her natural life.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall make all needful regulations for carrying into effect the provisions of this act, and he is hereby authorized to designate an employee of the classified civil service as chief of the retirement bureau, which bureau is hereby established, at a compensation of $1,800 per annum, and also to designate from the classified civil service such number of clerks, not exceeding three, as may be necessary in his judgment to assist the said chief of bureau, at a compensation of $1,200 per annum, the compensation of the said chief of bureau and that of his assistants to be paid from the said civil-service retirement fund. And it shall be the duty of the said chief of bureau and his assistants to keep full and accurate records of all retirements which shall be certified to the Secretary of the Treasury by the Civil Service Commission as hereinbefore provided, and to keep full and accurate accounts of all receipts, investments, reinvestments, and disbursements on account of the said civil-service retirement fund, with proper vouchers for all disbursements, and such accounts shall be audited by the Auditor of the Treasury Department as the monetary accounts of the Government are audited by him, and the said chief of the bureau of retirement may be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury as a disbursing agent in connection with the said fund.

SEC. 6. That the United States Civil Service Commission is authorized to employ a clerk from the classified civil service in addition to its present clerical force, whose duty it shall be to record all proceedings of the commission in connection with retirements under the provisions of this act, whose compensation shall be $1,200 per annum, and shall be payable by the Secretary of the Treasury from the said civil-service retirement fund.

SEC. 7. That all payments and disbursements in connection with retirements under the provisions of this act shall be paid from the said civil-service retirement fund, and in no event shall claims or demands which shall or may arise under the provisions of this act become a charge upon the Government or upon any Government funds, or upon any fund, excepting the said civil-service retirement fund. And if the claims and demands upon the said fund shall at any time exceed the funds applicable thereto, such demands shall be declared by the Secretary of the Treasury to be demands failing for lack of funds, and shall not be paid until the said fund shall be augmented as herein originally provided.

SEC. 8. That an employee of the classified civil service who shall be discharged from his or her position, or who shall die before becoming eligible for retirement under the provisions of this act, shall have refunded to him or her, or shall have paid to his or her estate, the amount of pay withheld during his or her term of office; and if any person shall be removed from office after becoming eligible for retirement and before being retired under the provisions of this act, the right of such retirement shall not be affected by such removal.

A bill (H. R. 497) for the purpose of pensioning persons in the civil service.

[Introduced by Mr. HURLEY.]

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That beginning with the 1st day of January, 1898, there shall be withheld from the salary of every employee, including those already appointed and to be appointed, in the Executive Departments of the classified service and the general service whose salary is fixed by law, a certain per centum, according to the plan hereinafter recited, out of his or her monthly pay, to be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the United States civil-service fund as a special deposit fund to be expended for the retirement of the employees of the classified service in the Executive Departments and general service above mentioned, such retirement to be subject to the conditions hereinafter recited.

GRADED PLAN.

All employees in the Executive Departments of the classified service and the general service whose salaries are fixed by law shall be graded according to their number of years of service, to wit:

Employees who have been in any of the Executive Departments or the general service for a period of less than five years, in Class A; five years but not ten years, in Class B; ten years but not fifteen years, in Class C; fifteen years but not twenty years, in Class D; twenty years or over, in Class E; and there shall be withheld from the monthly pay of all employees in Class A 1 per cent of salary; Class B, 2 per cent of salary; Class C, 3 per cent of salary; Class D, 4 per cent of salary; Class E, 5 per cent of salary.

Employees of Class A at the expiration of their fifth year of service shall enter Class B; employees of Class B at the expiration of their tenth year of service shall enter Class C; employees of Class C at the expiration of their fifteenth year of service shall enter Class D, and those who are in Class D at the expiration of their twentieth year of service shall enter Class E, and there shall be withheld from their monthly pay the regular per cent of that class.

On and after January 1, 1901, the employees of the above-mentioned classified departmental service and general service shall be retired from duty at a pay equal to 50 per cent of the salary they had been receiving for at least three years previous to retirement, as hereinafter provided for and subject to the following conditions:

CONDITIONS OF RETIREMENT.

First. All those who have reached the age of 50 years and have been employed in any of the Executive Departments or in the general service for a period of twenty years, and are totally disabled for the further performance of their ordinary duties because of physical disability not the result of vicious habits, shall be retired on the above pay upon their own request and after due medical proof of such disability has been furnished to the board of trustees.

Second. All those who have reached the age of 55 years and have been employed in any of the Executive Departments or in the general service for a period of twenty-three years may, upon their own request, be retired upon the pay above mentioned.

Third. All those who have reached the age of 60 years and have been employed in any of the Executive Departments or in the general service for a period of twenty years may, upon their own request, be retired upon the above pay.

Fourth. All those who have reached the age of 65 years and have been employed in any of the Executive Departments or in the general service for a period of at least twenty years shall be retired upon the above-named pay.

Employees of any of the Executive Departments or in the general service of the classified service who, after fifteen years of service and before the completion of their twentieth year of service, may resign, and provided such resignations are entirely voluntary and against whom no grave charges are pending at the time of such resignation, may avail themselves of the benefits of the United States civil-service retirement fund by making monthly payments to the said retirement fund equal to the monthly payments or assessments they would have to make to the said fund had they remained in the Government service; but all such employees who may have resigned as stated, and who shall fail to make the said monthly payment within thirty days after the same have become due, shall forfeit all claims to any portion of the fund or benefits to be derived therefrom.

Any employee who may voluntarily resign before the completion of his or her fifteenth year of service forfeits all claims to any portion of the retirement fund and all benefits to be derived therefrom, and to all moneys he or she has paid into the same.

Any employee dismissed from service upon charges forfeits all claims to any portion of the fund, to the benefits to be derived therefrom, and to all moneys he or she has paid into the retirement fund.

No employee who has been promoted or whose salary has been increased shall be entitled to the retirement pay belonging to that increased salary unless he or she has been drawing the said increased salary for at least three years previous to his or her retirement and has paid the regular percentage of the same for the three years previous to his or her retirement; and in case he or she is retired before the completion of the said three years, then he or she shall draw only the pension proper to the salary he or she had been receiving before his or her promotion or increase of salary.

All employees in the classified service dismissed from the Government service for other reason or cause than on charges of misconduct or incompetence, such as in case of a necessary reduction of the forces, shall be entitled to a refund of all the moneys he or she has paid into the United States civil-service retirement fund, with interest at 4 per cent, and which refund shall be made to him or her on the next succeeding regular pension pay day; but any employee dismissed or discharged as above, and against whom grave charges of misconduct or incompetence were pending at the time of dismissal or discharge, shall forfeit all claims to any refund.

From every employee retired on a pension who has not contributed in assessments to the retirement fund an amount equal to one year's retirement pay, proper to the salary he or she was receiving for at least three years previous to his or her retirement, there shall be deducted or withheld every year 10 per cent of his or her retirement pay until the total amount of all his or her assessments paid previous to his or her retirement and the amount of such deductions of 10 per cent equal the sum of one year's retirement pay, unless the said employee had been retired because of disability through injury or disease contracted in the actual performance of his or her duties while in the service.

Government employees retired according to the provisions of this act shall not be held subject to jury or military duty in any State of this Union, nor shall their pensions be attachable for debts of any kind nor judgments contracted either before or after the passage of this act; and the retirement pay shall be free from all taxation.

No portion or part of the retirement fund may be paid out for any other purpose or object than in pensions to retired superannuated employees, or to those who have been retired on account of permanent and total disability to perform the duties of their office through injury or disease contracted in the actual performance of their duties, as hereinafter provided for.

All employees who have contracted any disease or injury in the performance of their duties, and while actually engaged in the performance of such duties, and who have become thereby totally incapacitated and disabled to further perform such duties, and whose salary has been discontinued by the Department on account of such incapacity, and who have been in the service twelve years or more, shall, upon sufficient medical proof being furnished to the board of trustees, be placed on the retired list and be entitled to the retirement pay proper to the salary they were drawing for three years previous to their retirement.

But should any such employee, retired as above stated, be at any time thereafter reinstated upon recovery sufficient to enable him or her to perform the duties of his or her office, then further payment of pension shall cease, and credit for the time he or she was disabled shall be allowed.

No employee in the classified service who has served twenty years or more shall be retired on pay, except as hereinbefore provided for, who is, in the opinion of the board of trustees, mentally and physically qualified to perform the duties of his or her office in a satisfactory manner, but any such employee who has attained the sixtieth year of his or her age, and has been in the service at least twenty-five years and who has made due application for retirement, may be granted the same.

Retirement shall be granted according to the provisions of this act and in the order in which applications for the same have been made, but preference in order shall always be given to those employees who are physically or mentally disabled or disqualified to perform the duties of their respective offices.

Application for retirement shall be made to the board of trustees at least three months before the date of retirement.

BOARD OF TRUSTEES.

The Civil Service Commissioners of the United States and their successors in office are hereby constituted a board of trustees of the United States civil-service retirement fund.

The chairman of the Civil Service Board and his successor in office shall be chairman ex officio of the board of trustees of the United States civil-service pension fund.

The trustees, as soon as practicable after the passage of this act, shall organize as such board, and shall appoint, by a majority vote of the board, a secretary.

The duties of the secretary of the board of trustees shall be only clerical, and he shall have no voice nor vote in the deliberations or actions of the board of trustees.

The board of trustees shall have charge of and administer all matters pertaining to the retirement fund, and may from time to time, with the consent of the Secretary of the Treasury, invest the surplus, if any, or any part thereof as they may deem most beneficial to the fund, and they are hereby empowered to take all necessary and proper actions and proceedings in the premises, and to make payment, etc., in pursuance of this act.

The board of trustees shall from time to time establish such rules and regulations for the proper administration of the fund as they may deem best.

The board of trustees shall make an annual report in detail and shall cause the same to be printed and copies thereof sent to the Secretary of the Treasury and to all Government employees who are in the classified service. The report shall be made in January of each year, and shall contain a full and detailed account of all receipts and disbursements on account of the fund.

No reward, gratuity, or compensation whatever shall be allowed to the trustees for their services in connection with this fund.

The secretary of the board shall hold office for four years unless reelected by the board of trustees, and shall receive as reward or compensation for his services as such secretary an annual sum equal to three times (or less, at the option of the board of trustees) the sum of his annual assessments to the retirement fund.

The board of trustees, as soon as practicable after organizing as such board, shall cause to be classified, according to the plan above cited, all Government employees who come under the provisions of this act, and shall cause the names, ages, and dates of appointments of all such employees to be entered in a book arranged for their reception, and as soon as practicable thereafter shall mail, or cause to be mailed, to every Government employee who comes under the provisions of this act a circular containing information as to his age, date of his appointment, class to which he belongs, his salary, the per centum of his class, and the amount of his monthly assessment.

The above may be made to read: "Shall mail the circular to the heads of Departments, who shall notify their subordinates."

The expenses of the above classification shall be paid out of the moneys collected on the first month, etc.

All acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

This act shall take effect immediately.

And the gentleman from Pennsylvania knows that the money which these people would receive if this bill should become a law would come out of the Government. The money would be paid by the Government.

Mr. BROSIUS. Now, does not my friend know that no Frenchman, no Roman, and no Englishman would ever hold a pension to be money that was paid by the man to himself?

Mr. PEARSON. It is not proposed that the man pay it to himself.

Mr. BROSIUS. It is proposed that he shall contribute to the fund.

Mr. PEARSON. It is proposed that the money shall be assessed upon his colleagues and associates.

Mr. BROSIUS. It comes out of his own salary and out of the salaries of the other clerks, and goes to them at the time of their retirement. This Government does not lose anything.

Mr. PEARSON. I am happy to be able to quote in justification of the position that I take from one of the greatest leaders of Republican thought in this country. Mr. Blaine, in his Twenty Years in Congress, says distinctly, "A life tenure can not be adopted as a rule unless pensions for a civil list shall follow," volume 2, page 649, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROSIUS], who has studied this question of civil service in all parts of the world and in all the languages of the world, knows that wherever there is a life tenure and retirement fund in any country on the globe to-day—and this is a broad statement—there is a civil pension list. It follows as naturally as the night the day.

The gentleman can not expect to eat sour grapes without having his teeth set on edge. It has been so since the history of the human race began, and you can not have this system without pursuing it to its legitimate consequences. Now, Mr. Chairman, while I am getting some of these data into the RECORD, I shall ask the Clerk to read a letter which I addressed last summer to the chairman of the Committee on Civil Service of this House and his reply thereto. Lest there should be any question as to the propriety of this action upon my part, I informed the chairman that I would put my letter and his in the RECORD, and he gave his assent.

Mr. BROSIUS. You can put into the RECORD any letter that I have written.

The Clerk read as follows:

ASHEVILLE, N. C., August 7, 1897.

DEAR SIR: I shall be obliged if you will inform me whether a collector of internal revenue has the right, under the civil-service law, to require his subordinates to stand an examination in order to test their fitness. In other words, has not the collector the right to require that the men who are in the Government employ, without examination, should stand the same test as those who are seeking to enter the Government employ?

Very respectfully,

RICHMOND PEARSON.

Hon. JOHN R. PROCTER,
Chairman Civil Service Commission, Washington, D. C.

Mr. PEARSON. The same letter was addressed to Mr. BROSIUS officially, and here are the two replies. I ask the Clerk to read that of Mr. BROSIUS, and shall insert the other in the RECORD.

The Clerk read as follows:

LANCASTER, PA., August 15, 1897.

MY DEAR MR. PEARSON: Replying to your favor of the 12th instant, I have to say that there is no warrant either in the civil-service act or the rules promulgated under it for subjecting persons already in the service to examinations. This is the construction uniformly adopted. The reason of this is obvious. Service itself is the highest test of fitness. Having stood that, it would be absurd to subject one to an inferior test. And I can not think it possible that any one in a lucid interval would seriously suggest the examination of employees already in the service, excepting for promotion. With kind regards, I am,

Very truly, yours,

M. BROSIUS.

The other letter above referred to is as follows:

UNITED STATES CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., August 11, 1897.

SIR: This commission is in receipt of your communication of August 2, asking to be informed whether a collector of internal revenue has the right, under the civil-service law, to require his subordinates to stand an examinations in order to test their fitness.

In response I hand you a copy of the thirteenth report and invite your attention to Rule II, clause 7, at page 54, under which persons occupying positions in the service at the time they are classified are entitled to all the rights and benefits of persons appointed upon examination. After a person is once in the service his conduct and capacity in the actual performance of his duties are to be observed by the officers under whom he serves, and his absolute appointment at the end of six months' probation is made dependent upon their report.

There is a difference in the value of competitive examinations for admission to the service and for retention or promotion after the man is once in. The applicant on the outside is a stranger to the office and ignorant of the duties to be performed. Those in the service are well known to their superiors, serving under their eyes, and none should know so well as they the capacity and the qualifications needed. The clear intent and purpose of the rules are to make continuance in the service entirely dependent upon the report of the officers under whom the man serves and who are acquainted with his fitness for the duties performed. The superior officers are to observe whether the man is of good character and fidelity, and whether he has shown in the service adequate practical qualifications for doing the public work in a satisfactory manner.

Very respectfully,

JOHN B. HARLOW,
Acting President.

Hon. RICHMOND PEARSON,
Asheville, N. C.

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Chairman, I have taken the liberty of bringing up that letter, in order to show the extent to which the advanced civil-service reformers of this day carry their doctrines. Here it is intimated by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Civil Service that no man in a lucid interval would suggest that men who are in office, put there without examination and perhaps unable to stand the examination, should be placed upon the same footing as the men who are applying to enter the service; in other words, if I may give an illustration—and, as my friend from Iowa says, the concrete is often better than the theoretical—there are in my district, I will say to my friend from Pennsylvania, about 200 revenue officers, all of them put into office, not as a reward of merit, not on account of any tested fitness, but simply because they were rank, conspicuous Democratic partisans. And I say boldly that of that 200 there are perhaps not 10 who could stand the test of the examination required of new applicants. Where is your boasted equality if you make such discriminations as this?

Now, I am told by the chairman, my colleague on the committee, that when I suggest that those men on the inside—Democrats—should be put upon the same footing as the men on the outside who may be Republicans, the proposition is an indication that the man making it is non compos mentis—the mere asking to put a Republican upon the same footing with a Democrat we are told would not be suggested by any man in a "lucid interval." If this is the logic of the situation, if this be "the complexion to which we have come at last," it is about time that we were taking our bearings in this matter and ascertaining where this doctrine has carried us, and where it may project us in the future.

Mr. COX. May it not be the fact that one who says that the man in office is a Democrat and therefore not competent is non compos mentis?

Mr. PEARSON. My suggestion is that as a matter of fairness and justice the men who are in are entitled to no advantage over men who are applying for the same positions——

Mr. COX. I agree with the gentleman in that.

Mr. PEARSON. If the fact be admitted that they have been put in on account of their partisanship, a thing directly opposed to the spirit and purpose of the civil-service act.

Now, what would be the disadvantage to the Government in requiring of those men in office to stand the same test which others applying for positions are obliged to stand? If merit is what we are aiming at, why not put all men to the same test and take the best, only the best, without regard to politics?

But the position taken by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is particularly exasperating and aggravating just now, because one high in authority has come to tell us that these men in office without examination, and perhaps unable to stand examination—most of them Democrats—are there for life. It is this that makes this position particularly hard; it is this which gives special and extraordinary interest to the question of civil service at this time; it is this which has made more than a hundred members of this House—Republicans, too—say, "Aware and fully cognizant of the declarations of our party at St. Louis and in all of its previous platforms, we come here to say that no such doctrine as this has ever been announced before." And I dare say to my friend from Pennsylvania that if the order of May 6, which was not promulgated until after our convention——

Mr. BROSIUS. Will my friend allow me? I do not like to interrupt him.

Mr. PEARSON. Why, I am charmed with the gentleman's interruptions, because they bring out so much light.

Mr. BROSIUS. I know the gentleman means to be fair and correct; therefore he will allow me to say that the order of the President was issued in May, and our convention was not held till June or later.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. And the order was notoriously in course of preparation months before it was issued.

Mr. BROSIUS. It was published in all the newspapers of the country.

Mr. PEARSON. Will the gentleman take the statement of the Civil Service Commission in regard to these dates?

Mr. BROSIUS. Well, I do not take anybody's statement if it is not correct. [Laughter.]

Mr. PEARSON. Shall we accept the gentleman's unsupported authority? Of course he thinks that he is correct; but here are constructions placed upon that order, one of them bearing date in June—after the convention had met; one of them (though I understand this is a typographical error) bearing date November 2, the day before the last Presidential election. But the great power and great viciousness of that order comes out by the construction of January 12, 1897—seven months after our convention. [Applause.]

Mr. BROSIUS. Now my friend ought to know—and I am sure he is willing to know the truth—that there has been no order issued by anybody extending the civil-service regulations since the order of May 6—two or three months before either of the great conventions was held.

Mr. PEARSON. The gentleman, I take it for granted, is acquainted with the provisions of that order; he has made a special study of these matters, and he knows perfectly well that the commission would never have taken the trouble to give instructions to the different Departments as to the meaning of that order, which was done, I think, on June 10, if there had not been a difference of construction; and when these Departments undertook to disregard that particular interpretation of the commission, it was necessary for President Cleveland, in 1897—more than seven months after our convention—to tell what was the real purpose, aim, and motive of that order, which is not only in contradiction of the uniform tenor of the Republican declarations on the subject of civil service, but is in direct contradiction of the terms of the civil-service law itself.

As for taking laborers and workmen and undertaking to classify them under the law of 1883, even the gentleman from Pennsylvania knows that it is a distinct and direct violation of the purpose, aim, motive, spirit, and intent of that act.

I say, without fear of contradiction, that if these two Executive orders, which change the whole nature of the law—if these new and dangerous doctrines of life tenure and civil pensions had been promulgated before the Republican national convention, that great body of patriots, instead of indorsing the system, would have boldly denounced doctrines repugnant alike to our form of government and to the spirit of our institutions.

Mr. BROSIUS. I want to interrupt my friend from North Carolina again——

Mr. PEARSON. Well, Mr. Chairman, I was only going to take twenty-five minutes of the time for myself; but as long as my friend from Pennsylvania desires to interrupt me with questions, I shall feel it a duty, as well as a pleasure, to occupy the time of the committee in answering him.

Mr. BROSIUS. Then I will not ask the gentleman what I intended to ask. I was going to inquire whether it would be agreeable to him to interrupt him once more——

Mr. PEARSON. With pleasure.

Mr. BROSIUS. Because I desired to correct a statement which the gentleman has no doubt inadvertently made.

Mr. PEARSON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania knows that he will have every courtesy from the interrogatee. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROSIUS. I do not desire to interrupt the gentleman merely for the sake of occupying time, but for the purpose of securing the correction of what I think is an inadvertent statement on his part.

Now, after the order of extension to which he has referred was promulgated by the President, it became necessary to make some alterations in the mode of putting into operation the order, when those changes were made progressively from day to day, until, I think, the last one was promulgated in January last. I want to say to my friend, therefore, that he is in error when he says that the law was violated and the declarations of the Republican platform as well——

Mr. PEARSON (interrupting). Well, now, is the gentleman from Pennsylvania asking a question or making an argument? [Laughter.]

Mr. BROSIUS. I am only engaged now in correcting a mistake into which my friend has inadvertently fallen, I am sure.

Mr. PEARSON. Very well.

Mr. BROSIUS. I merely wanted to say that there has not been, so far as I am aware, a single solitary laborer who has been covered into the civil service—not one, I think—except possibly in occasional instances some skilled laborer; and if any were so covered it was because the head of the Department designated them for classification, because of some special reason, with which the Civil Service Commission has nothing on earth to do.

Mr. PEARSON. Now, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania has concluded his statement, I will read, by the kindness of my friend from Iowa [Mr. LACEY], a direct contradiction of the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [laughter], made by the Civil Service Commission, which shows that laborers have been classified under the civil-service law, and not only that, but that they have classified men whom they did not examine, but simply registered.

Mr. BROSIUS. Why, there are some 16,000 who were not examined by any academic examination.

Mr. PEARSON. Well, laborers by any other name would do the same work, whether you call them watchmen, laborers, or blacksmiths, or tool grinders, dam tenders, or hardeners, or any other appellation with which you choose to decorate them; they are all placed in the same category. Now, for instance, I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania the meaning of certain names applied to employees as you find them in this report called "Hearings before Committee on Appropriations." What is a "hardener," or a "dam tender"? [Laughter.]

Mr. BROSIUS. The gentleman will find, I think, that the men to whom reference is made are skilled laborers.

Mr. PEARSON. Why, we find in this civil service that there are some 300 separate kinds of examinations pressed upon these poor devils by the civil-service inquisitors. [Laughter.]

But, Mr. Chairman, it will be very much more profitable than anything that I have said or could say, or possibly than anything that has been said by interlocutors in this debate, to read directly from the report of the commission itself. This is a matter that gentlemen have access to. We find here laborers classified in the Government Hospital for the Insane. "No examination of any kind is given for the position. Applicants are registered in the order of filing their applications." You classify men of whom no examination at all is required.

There it will be seen that the name of "laborer" is employed by the commission itself, but in order not to abuse the patience of the committee and to give to the House information better than I have heard, either from myself or my interruptors here, I desire to make this brief statement, and in all candor, to my fellow-Republicans, to whom I desire specially to address myself. I am sorry the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] is not present. I admired the candor and fairness of his argument, and while I think he practically admitted himself out of court, I can not but give him credit for the ability he has brought to the consideration of the question. He showed that it was rather in the administration than in the principle of the law that these abuses have grown up.

Now, I undertake to say, and I shall endeavor to show it, that there were five distinct objects aimed at in the original act. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will himself agree with me in this regard. First, economy in the public service; second, efficiency in the civil service; third, equality and impartiality to States and to individuals; fourth, the opening of the avenues of advancement to unaided merit without regard to religion or politics, and, fifth, the prevention of compulsory assessments for political purposes. I can not cover the whole ground, but I shall attempt to point out the particulars in which these objects have failed of attainment.

There is not a man who will not admit that certain of these aims are desirable.

I say, and I say it freely, because I desire to be understood as being perfectly fair, that the act which prevents compulsory assessments upon officeholders is a most excellent act. It is a part of the law. It has, to a certain extent, been successful in preventing those bad practices, and I do not desire its repeal.

Now, as to the question of efficiency, there is no way by which a comparison can be had between the years preceding the civil-service act and the years which have followed it; but, Mr. Chairman, when you come to the main motive which was in view, and which the friends of that bill profess to be their actuating motive, which was economy in the public service, I shall read figures now which ought to put to blush these exceedingly holy and pious men who dare to denounce us as spoilsmen. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BROSIUS. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. PEARSON. I shall only read these figures and then conclude.

Mr. BROSIUS. I ask that the gentleman be allowed ten minutes in addition.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman be permitted to have ten minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PEARSON. Well, I shall have to cut out that peroration, I think. I am more interested in getting these figures stated.

Mr. BROSIUS. I will give you ten minutes more, if you want it.

Mr. PEARSON. No one will dispute the fairness with which the professed objects of the law have been stated; and I believe that most men, and certainly all candid men, will agree upon the actual results, whether due to the operation of the law, or to the violations of the law, or to perversions of the law, or to any other cause. I want to read the words of the commission here. The commission, in their thirteenth annual report, state under the head of "Demonstrated economy and efficiency:"

> From statistics recently compiled by the commission relative to the growth of the classified and unclassified branches of the service in Washington, D. C., it is shown that since 1883, when the civil-service law was enacted, there has been an increase of 37 per cent in the number and 43 per cent in the salaries of the unclassified places, while there has been a slight decrease in the number of the positions originally classified by the civil-service act as well as a decrease in the appropriations for those positions. It appears that the positions subject to competitive examination have increased, not because of extra appropriations, but on account of the extensions of the classified service to cover unclassified positions. Practically all of the increase in the unclassified positions occurred before they were included in the classified service.
> It is shown by the statistics that if the classified positions in Washington had increased in the same proportion as the unclassified positions while unclassified, an extra yearly expenditure covering many times the cost of the maintenance of the commission would be needed to pay the salaries of the Government employees. The temptation to increase the number of employees or to retain employees when there was no work for them to do, which was such a characteristic feature of the "spoils" system, has entirely disappeared under the new system. The pressure for office having been removed, decreases of force have been made from time to time in the classified service of the Departments during the last fourteen years as the work was completed, because there was no object in keeping unemployed persons on the pay rolls

I want to be judged by the accuracy of that statement. The only trouble with this declaration of the Civil Service Commission—and I say this deliberately—is that it is not true. It can not be sustained. It is contradicted by the figures of the commission themselves, and it is only a little less absurd than the following: They undertake to show that owing to the civil-service law a great economy, a great retrenchment, was effected in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing; and how do they show that? They show it by producing a report here which was made in 1877, six years before the civil-service act was put upon the books, and they claim a saving of $390,000, when, in point of fact, it had been saved before any man except Mr. Jenckes, of Rhode Island, had ever heard of this new doctrine.

Now, as to the question of economy. When the law went into operation there were in this Government, in all of its branches in the civil service, 110,000 people. There are to-day 178,000, an increase, as I stated to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY], of 68,000 people. The payments in 1883 amounted approximately, in the civil service, to $60,000,000. To-day they amount to $100,000,000. In the departmental classified service, according to the act of 1883, there were included 5,650 people. There are to-day, as the gentleman knows, in the same departmental service, 53,100 persons employed——

Mr. SWANSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PEARSON. Oh, I have not time now.

Mr. SWANSON. I am with you, but I want to ask you a question.

Mr. PEARSON. I know my friend is right; but let me reach my verb, with a few adjectives, and I will listen to the gentleman. [Laughter.] The expenses of this commission at its origin amounted to $6,800. The sum which they now ask us to appropriate for their benefit and for the personnel under their control amounts to $98,000, and the increase in their appropriation has gone on year by year. Year by year they come and ask for more—more money, more clerks, more places to be classified, more power.

Starting, Mr. Chairman, as an ancillary agency, intended to aid the Departments of this Government, it has grown until it has become a vast inquisition, not a part of any Department, not coordinate with any Department, but paramount to them all, giving orders to them all and requiring reports from them all; and, as was said by Blackstone, at last they find themselves in the position of those sophists in the Dark Ages "who perplexed all philosophy with the subtleties of scholastic disquisition and confused all science in the mazes of metaphysical jargon," and they come here now in order to be extricated from the entanglements in which they have placed themselves and all the Departments and all of us.

With litigation pending all over the country, instigated by their absurd rulings, they come here and ask us—for what? They ask for a "lawyer" [laughter], a permanent standing counsel. Not a member of this commission is a lawyer himself; and they come now and ask for a permanent counsel in order to extricate them from the difficulties in which they have plunged themselves, you, and all of us. Now on this question of the personnel——

Mr. LACEY. How much salary do they propose to give him?

Mr. PEARSON. About $1,600 a year, and they propose that he should lay down the law for the Supreme Court of the United States and all the Departments and all the branches and bureaus of the Government.

Mr. KERR. Do they expect to get a constitutional lawyer——

Mr. PEARSON. A lawyer that will resolve all the doubts that are troubling their minds now. [Laughter.] Any fool can ask a question, but it takes a different sort of an individual to answer it, as my friend from Pennsylvania knows. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. PEARSON. Why, certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I want to ask you a question or two.

Mr. PEARSON. I will get the gentleman to extend my time, because I have not got through with my statement of figures.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will help the gentleman to secure an extension of time. I should like to have some sort of an understanding. This debate is going to run four or five days. Do you gentlemen on that side of the Chamber opposed to this civil service as it exists intend to bring in a bill or any other measure——

Mr. PEARSON. I will show you a bill at half past 9 o'clock to-night. If you will step up to the door of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I will bring it to you and read it to you. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What I desired to ask you is whether you are going to introduce them in the House?

Mr. PEARSON. The first thing we are going to do is to try to get Mr. BROSIUS—I do not mention the gentleman's name with any desire of offense; I should have said the chairman of the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service—to report it; and if he does not report it, that committee will instruct your humble servant to report it. [Applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, I——

Mr. PEARSON. I ought not to have given this away. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does this bill that you speak of propose to modify the civil service or to remodel or repeal it?

Mr. PEARSON. I am sure that the gentleman has been so often engaged in colloquies that he will recognize that if I undertake to answer that question I may lose sight of the main point I am about to bring up here. I will see him later. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will you gentlemen opposed to the civil-service system on that side of the House use your best endeavors to get your bill considered after it comes in?

Mr. PEARSON. We will make the most earnest effort, and will go to the extreme and disagreeable extent, if necessary, of voting with Democrats to do it. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. All right.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana sought to make a suggestion.

Mr. PEARSON. Now, I can not yield any more of my time, as it is limited, and I have these figures to read, because I have not answered the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Massachusetts. I am desirous to give the facts, and I undertake to say that there has been an increase in the personnel of the service and an increase in the expenditures constantly in the classified service itself since it was inaugurated, and I can be contradicted if I am wrong, because I put the figures down.

I have gone to the Blue Book myself, and with my pencil I have counted the names of men in the several bureaus and Departments who were drawing money in 1883 and find there the men who are drawing the same money for similar duty to-day. And I find these startling facts.

In the Bureau of Printing and Engraving, to which reference was made by my friend as an example of retrenchment and economy—why, gentlemen, that committee, when it was first created, was the Committee on Civil Service Reform and Retrenchment. Now, they have left out "retrenchment," and very properly. Gentlemen say it ought to be the Committee on "Intrenchment." Once they get in and they are there for life and forever.

In that Bureau of Engraving and Printing in 1883, at the time of the passage of this act, there were 11 employees who were drawing annual salaries of $1,200 or above. In that same bureau to-day, where this boasted economy has been effected and where in 1883 there were 11 employees drawing these salaries, there are now 84 employees drawing salaries of $1,200 or more. In the office of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury in 1883 there were 8 employees at salaries of $1,200 and over.

[Here the hammer fell.]

On motion of Mr. BROSIUS, by unanimous consent, the time of Mr. PEARSON was extended until he could finish his remarks.

Mr. PEARSON. I will not abuse the patience of the committee beyond two minutes more. In that same bureau where there were 8 employees drawing salaries of $1,200 or over, there are now 90 employees drawing salaries of $1,200 or more. In the Fifth Auditor's Office, as it was then called, now the "Office of the Auditor for the Department of State and other Departments," merely a change of name, where there were 23 persons drawing such salaries there are now 46. In the Patent Office there were 215 persons drawing salaries of that amount and over, and there are now 311. In the Land Office there were 210 persons drawing such salaries, and there are now 253.

I do not use the Pension Office as an illustration, because the business of that office has, of course, been enlarged, and it might not be fair. I do not use the Post-Office for the same reason; but the Land Office ought to show a reduction in force, because we have been parting with the public lands at the rate of three or four millions a year ever since the passage of the act. Consequently that office may be taken as a fair test; and it shows an increase in the number of persons drawing these salaries from 210 to 253. In the Coast and Geodetic Survey, where there were 53 persons drawing such salaries, the number has now gone up to 91. So it is running all the way through.

Therefore I say that the Government Blue Book stamps this statement of the Commissioners—I will not say as willfully false, but as absolutely unfounded in fact. If economy has been your main motive, then your main motive in the passage of this law has failed [applause], and now, while there was an increase in the expenditures of this Government of $40,000,000 from 1883 to 1897, if you go back of 1883 and take a similar period of fifteen years, you will find that the increase in the expenditures of the Government in that period, in the days of the degenerate politicians and spoilsmen, was only $15,000,000 as compared with $40,000,000 in the days of the blessed opalescent reform that we now have. [Laughter and applause.]

And I tell the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and with this I close, that ever since this law was passed—the Democrats ought not to hear this, but they know it [laughter]—ever since this law was passed, at every election following the election of a President the House of Representatives goes against the party in power, and at the next quadrennial election it goes against the party in power for the control of the Presidency, and it will be so just as long as the Republican party will permit itself and its policy to be guided by the pious and holy gentlemen in William street and their disciples.

If this party is to win the next contest, and if it is to win in future contests, it must be guided by practical men, men of common sense [laughter], stalwart men, virile men, if you please, and not by the visionary doctrinaires, professional reformers, empirical philosophers, or the political eunuchs. [Loud applause.]

I here insert facts and data which interruptions prevented me from presenting in their order.

OFFICE OF CUSTODIAN,
UNITED STATES COURT-HOUSE AND POST-OFFICE,
Asheville, N. C., December 18, 1897.

DEAR SIR: On June 15 last, upon a recommendation of mine as custodian of United States court-house and post-office building at this place, Reginald H. Loder and William J. Merrell were appointed and entered upon the discharge of their duties as janitor and watchman, respectively. This appointment was for a period not to exceed ninety days. At the end of this time (ninety days) they were succeeded, respectively, by Joseph W. Heath and Charles A. Evans, jr., appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury upon a certification of the board of Civil Service Commission.

The first appointees, to wit, Loder and Merrell, did not possess literary qualifications sufficient to admit them under the rules of the civil service. Their successors were adjudged by the Civil Service Commission eminently qualified in that respect. But to show you how matters work I will state that soon after the civil-service appointees, to wit, Heath and Evans, entered upon the discharge of their duties, it became necessary to heat the building in my custody. At the very outset they admitted their inability to manipulate the heating apparatus in said building, and as a result had to employ at their personal expense the said William J. Merrell, whom Evans had succeeded by virtue of the civil-service rules.

On the one hand, Merrell and Loder were not qualified to comply with the rules of the civil service, and on the other hand their successors were. But when it came to the practical performance of the duties of their office, the latter were incompetent and unqualified to discharge the duties of their office, their civil-service attainments to the contrary notwithstanding.

Merrell was recommended by me for appointment to the position which he occupied for ninety days, for the reason that he is a practical fireman, engineer, heating-apparatus fitter, etc.

He was employed by the contractor who fitted up the heating apparatus in this building to assist in placing such apparatus, and personally helped to handle and place each pipe, valve, flue, and other necessary parts of the apparatus in this building, and because of his familiarity with such arrangements I thought proper to appoint him, and especially when I remember that the service of the heating department in this building has been very unsatisfactory since this house has been occupied, which fact is attributable as I believe, to the fact that inexperienced and incompetent men have had the heating department in charge.

I cite these facts to you to show you the impracticability of civil service as applied to janitor and watchman in this United States court-house and post-office building.

Merrell is now employed, as he has heretofore been employed during the winter season, by one of the leading hotels of Asheville, to supervise and run the heating department of that hotel. He is so employed because of his competency, skill, and familiarity with such work.

I note the interest you are taking in civil-service matters, and it meets the hearty indorsement of your party friends in this section of your district, and feeling an interest in the success of our party, I have taken the liberty to address you as to the workings of civil-service matters under my control.

Very respectfully,

C. B. MOORE, Custodian.

Hon. RICHMOND PEARSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

The Washington Star, on the subject of this plan, quotes Secretary Gage as saying: "We decided to establish a roll of honor, to which are to be transferred all clerks who have grown old and infirm in the service. * * * There are in one bureau of the Treasury eighty-seven clerks over 50 years of age, and one of them is 75. * * * They are to receive $900 a year, and we shall require of them only labor commensurate with their pay."

On the same subject Mr. Vanderlip is quoted as saying that "the plan will greatly increase the efficiency of the service in the Department." He admits that there is no law for the plan, but says there is nothing against it.

It might with propriety be suggested to Mr. Vanderlip that there is no law forbidding the establishment of a beer garden or a bowling alley in the Treasury Department, but the establishment of such forms of amusement was hardly contemplated by the wise founders of the Government.

The interview in question further shows, "That the Civil Service Commission was consulted on the subject, and agreed that the plan was a good one." Thus we find that this novel and ingenious plan of pensioning useless employees has the august sanction of the Civil Service Commission.

On the subject of life tenure and the power of removal I wish to make some quotations from the opinion of Judge Cox, delivered in the case of John G. Woods vs. James A. Gary, Postmaster-General, et al.:

"All offices of which the tenure is not fixed by the Constitution or limited by law must be held either during good behavior or (which is the same thing in contemplation of law) during the life of the incumbent or must be held at the will and discretion of some Department of the Government and subject to removal at pleasure. It can not for a moment be admitted that it was the intention of the Constitution that those offices which are denominated inferior offices should be held for life. * * * It would be a most extraordinary construction of law that all these offices were to be held during life, which must inevitably follow unless the incumbent was removed at the discretion of the head of the Department. * * *

"The President certainly has no power to remove, and the Constitution has authorized Congress in certain cases to vest this power of 'appointment' in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments, and all inferior officers appointed under each, by authority of law, must hold their offices at the discretion of the appointing power. Such is the settled usage and practical construction of the Constitution and law under which these offices are held."

Again, Judge Cox declares, "The power of removal is intrenched in the law. It is created by an act of legislation and can only be taken away or modified by similar authority. * * * But if any rule prepared by this commission, whether published by the President or not, should have the effect of repealing or modifying an act of Congress, it would be an act of legislation, and not a regulation of a mere Executive character, which it was clearly the object of the law to authorize. It is a grave question whether Congress could delegate to the President or to any board of commissioners jointly with the President the authority to do any act which is equivalent to legislation."

It should be noted that the Civil Service Commission, at its origin and uniformly for a period of thirteen years, disavowed any such extraordinary claims. They state in their first report, page 26: "A life tenure would be indefensible. The civil-service act and rules leave the authority and duty of removal undisturbed, except," they go on to say, "in the case of removals for political or religious reasons."

In their fourth annual report they protest as follows: "Another objection that is urged by unfair opponents of the civil-service system is that it tends toward a permanent office-holding community; that it was copied from the English system, under which a privileged class controlled all the offices; that it is utterly at variance with our political institutions; that ours being a government of the people, by the people, for the people, the competitive examination system of appointment is not, therefore, in accord with the sentiment of democratic America. This objection is foundationless, and it is illogical as well. In respect to tenure, the civil-service act made no change from the patronage system, except to provide a probational term of appointments."

In the same report Mr. Edgerton, one of the commissioners, lays down this doctrine: "He who now questions or denies the right of removal without assigning reasons virtually says to the appointing power, 'I know you have the constitutional right to displace me, but you shall not exercise that right, or you shall exercise it only in such manner as I think proper to prescribe. I will not, without complaint, consent to a dismissal unless you shall give a reason satisfactory for it to me and to my friends.' Who in such a condition of affairs would be master, the responsible man or the subordinate? In every business there must be some master, but who could be master of a clerk who believed he held an office from which he could not be dismissed?"

Such was the opinion of the commission in the ancient and purer days of the reform movement.

As late as 1896, in their thirteenth annual report, the commissioners concede this point. They say, on page 19 of that report: "The power of removal is not affected by the law or the rule further than that they provide that removals shall not be made for political or religious reasons."

It is perfectly certain that the civil-service act would never have become a law if it had included the powers which the President assumes in his order of July 27, 1897.

In the discussion of the civil-service bill Mr. Herbert, of Alabama, speaking for the Democrats, then in the majority in this House, says: "He [Mr. Calkins] well knows that the bill does not take away, and does not pretend to take away, the power of removal. I would never vote for it if it did."—Congressional Record, Forty-seventh Congress, second session, page 863.

On the same subject Senator Pendleton, the author of the bill, says: "There has been great misapprehension as to the methods and scope of the bill. I desire the attention of Senators while I briefly state them: The bill simply applies to the Executive Departments of the Government here in Washington, and to those offices throughout the country—post-offices and custom-houses—which employ more than fifty persons. The number of such offices, together with those in the Departments here, will not exceed 10,000. The bill does not touch the question of tenure of office or removal from office."—Ibid., page 207.

"Mr. HAWLEY. For myself, then, I say distinctly, * * * that the executive chiefs of higher or lower grade should have a certain power of dismissal over their men at any time, and we can not have a decent public service without it." (Ibid., page 355.)

These uniform declarations of the commissioners themselves, and of the authors of the act, would seem to justify, in the light of recent events, the caustic denunciation and sardonic prophesy of Senator Ingalls.

Let me read from the RECORD:

"Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Kansas, or any other Senator, maintain that the power of removal is in the least diminished by the establishment of this commission?

"Mr. INGALLS. No, it is not; but this bill appears to be supported by each party for the purpose of cheating the other. It is sustained by one party upon grounds that are absolutely adverse to those on which it is supported by the other, and it will end by defrauding both." (Ibid., page 354.)

Before passing from this branch of the subject, let me recall the memorable words of Senator Voorhees: "I say here that the proposition that the President shall administer this Government by and through the aid of unfriendly hands, men opposed to his policy, who will thwart and deceive him, put up their money against him, and vote against him, is a chimera of the brain, unfit for the councils of sane men." (Ibid, page 357.)

Mr. Chairman, there have been extensions of this law so clearly beyond its original scope and purpose, and certain abuses in its administration which are so manifestly indefensible, that the real friends of the merit system, if they wish to preserve the system, should look the facts squarely in the face and support a reasonable modification not, perhaps, of the law itself, but of the absurd code of rules which has been built up under the pretended authority of the law.

Mr. LANDIS was recognized.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman from Indiana proceeds, I desire to say that my colleague on the committee, Mr. HEMENWAY, is unavoidably absent to-day and has sent a message to me that he desires that at least some part of his time may be occupied by his colleague, Mr. LANDIS. I trust, therefore, that the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS] for thirty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS] is recognized for thirty minutes.

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman, I presume that, holding the opinions I do with reference to the civil-service law as now construed and enforced, I shall be called a spoilsman. It seems that everyone is so branded who does not meekly subscribe to the university extension system foisted and fastened upon this Republic by a few choice air-castle builders who constantly advertise themselves to the world as "the better element." This element is not large numerically, but it is exceedingly active. The hours and the minutes it does not consume in attempting to get office for itself it consumes in attempting to keep deserving people out of office. [Laughter.] I never knew a crowd nor a clique in any community or country calling itself "the better element" that was not narrow, selfish, bigoted, and dangerous. [Laughter and applause.]

Take the gentlemen who are responsible for the perversion and prostitution of the principle of civil-service reform. They have played the political guerrilla in every campaign since 1880; and you know it just as well as I. [Applause.] They have bulldozed and cowed national conventions. They have demoralized and stampeded Senators and Representatives. They have hypnotized Presidents of the United States. [Laughter.] But by a bold and audacious policy of political pirating they have managed to sit continuously at the banqueting board. [Laughter.]

Mr. PEARSON. The gentleman refers to the commission?

Mr. LANDIS. I want it understood, gentlemen, right here at the outset, that when I refer to professional civil-service reformers I do not mean the gentlemen in this House who are backing up this commission. They are misguided statesmen. [Laughter.] I want this understood, too, that I am not in favor of the absolute repeal of this law. I am in favor of modifying the law, defining and construing its powers, setting forth in statute form its scope and limitations and bringing it in harmony with American institutions. [Applause.]

Before we adjourned for the holidays the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] arose and spoke in opposition to any proposed modification of this law. After hearing the eloquent and impassioned address of my distinguished colleague I thought that possibly I was laboring under a misapprehension as to the real sentiment of the people of my district with reference to this question. I accordingly stepped to the telegraph office and sent to each publisher of the recognized Republican newspapers in my district this telegram: "Are you in favor of the civil-service law as now construed and enforced?" To that I received the following answers:

CRAWFORDSVILLE, IND., December 10, 1897.

Hon. C. B. LANDIS:

I stand by the St. Louis platform, McKinley's letter of acceptance, and his late message. No backward steps. Improve; but repeal, never.

T. H. B. McCAIN, Editor Journal.

NOBLESVILLE, IND., December 10, 1897.

C. B. LANDIS, House of Representatives:

No; we favor a modification of civil-service law so as to promote the best results to the public service.

WALKER & CRAIG, Editors Ledger.

ATTICA, IND., December 10, 1897.

Hon. LANDIS, House of Representatives:

I am not, because it breeds dissatisfaction among the people without increasing efficiency among the employees.

A. S. PEACOCK, Ledger.

COVINGTON, IND., December 10, 1897.

C. B. LANDIS, House of Representatives:

No; change it to a merit system. It will help to purify politics.

C. D. CASE, Editor Republican.

FRANKFORT, IND., December 10, 1897.

Hon. C. B. LANDIS:

Sentiment among Clinton County Republicans practically unanimous against present civil-service system. Rank and file have no patience with it.

ED. H. BURNS, Editor News.

TIPTON, IND., December 10, 1897.

Hon. C. B. LANDIS, Washington, D. C.:

In favor modification civil-service law with limited tenure. Chiefs of Departments should be judges of qualifications; would not destroy the principle of civil service.

M. W. PERSHING, Editor Advocate.

DELPHI, IND., December 10, 1897.

Hon. C. B. LANDIS,
House of Representatives,
210 North Capitol street, Washington, D. C.:

Test of efficiency can be applied to members of the party charged with Government responsibility. People ask no more. They demand this.

V. L. RICKETTS,
Editor Delphi Journal.

LEBANON, IND., December 10, 1897.

Hon. C. B. LANDIS:

Stand by Republican platforms and McKinley's message. No backward step.

S. N. CRAGUN.

I want to say that no man comes nearer representing the sentiment of the community in which he lives than the editor of the country newspaper. His business brings him in contact with the people. He knows their thoughts, he sympathizes with them in their sorrows and rejoices with them in their victories. Seven out of the eight editors of Republican papers in the district I represent are in favor of the modification of this law.

One week ago it was my privilege and pleasure to attend a conference of the leading Republicans of Indiana held in Indianapolis. That conference was attended by between 500 and 800 Republicans from all parts of the State. During that day I did not talk with a single Republican who did not favor the modification of this law as it is now construed and enforced. [Applause.]

Fortified with this evidence, satisfied as to the sentiment of my constituents, I desire, gentlemen, to ask your indulgence while I submit a few observations relative to the operation of this law.

We are told that it represents the merit system. The minute anyone suggests that it ought to be modified some professional civil-service reformer steps forward and says, "Hold! Hands off the merit system!" Does it represent true merit? Soon after Mr. Cleveland became President of the United States the second time he installed Logan Carlisle, son of Secretary Carlisle, in the Treasury Department, as official headsman. Logan Carlisle's administration of that office is known to-day as a public scandal. He was cold-blooded and brutal. He mocked at pleading men and jeered at weeping women. He continued manipulating the guillotine until he had discharged almost 2,000 Republicans and filled their places in most instances with Democrats. Then, after that was done, a blanket was placed over that Department, and upon it inscribed this legend: "The appointments in this Department represent the merit system." Do they? In all honesty and fairness, do they?

Mr. SIMPKINS of Massachusetts. Mr. Logan Carlisle's action represented the "spoils system," did it not?

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Logan Carlisle's action was indorsed by the Civil Service Commission, and it represents the alleged merit system to-day, because nothing has been done looking to an alteration or change.

Mr. BROSIUS. I understood my friend from Indiana to say that Logan Carlisle's action received the indorsement of the Civil Service Commission. Did the gentleman say that?

Mr. LANDIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROSIUS. Well, I desire to correct that statement; the gentleman has fallen inadvertently into an error. The statement is not correct.

Mr. LOW. Was that action condemned?

Mr. LANDIS. Was it condemned by any representative of the commission?

Mr. BROSIUS. The Civil Service Commission had nothing to do with the action of Logan Carlisle.

Mr. LANDIS. Does the gentleman say that the appointments under that administration represent the merit system?

Mr. BROSIUS. I say they represent the "spoils system." Every removal without cause for political reasons, to put in somebody else because he is a friend or an adherent of a political party, without having in view the good of the service, represents the "spoils system," not the merit system, and there never was a better illustration of the "spoils system" than the practices carried on by Logan Carlisle. [Applause.]

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman, if the guardians of the merit system are so anxious in its support, I would like to ask them if they have taken any steps to correct the abuses?

Mr. BROSIUS. Well, I do not know what the gentleman means by the "guardians of the merit system." The law itself is the guardian of the system. The action to which the gentleman refers was not a violation of the strict letter of the law, and hence under the law itself affords no remedy.

Mr. LANDIS. Does the gentleman think that the extension of the classified service to the Treasury Department, after Logan Carlisle's manipulations, represent the spirit of the law?

Mr. BROSIUS. Not at all. I have not made any such contention.

Mr. LANDIS. Then why do you rise to your feet every time a man points to an infraction of the law or charges injustice under it?

Mr. BROSIUS (interrupting). I rise to my feet when an honorable member on this floor characterizes it as a part of the merit system. I have endeavored to explain to the gentleman, and to the House, that what he refers to is a part of what is known as the "spoils system," which we have not yet been able to get rid of.

Mr. FARIS. If my colleague will allow me a moment, I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania, if the Civil Service Commission has nothing to do with the proceeding, why is it that whenever we attempt to put our finger on cases of violation of the law the Civil Service Commission rises and fights so bitterly every modification?

Mr. BROSIUS. It does nothing of the kind.

I want to say to my friend that if he has had his attention called to the law, if he has examined the matter, if he has looked into the subject at all, he will find that the Civil Service Commission has no possible control over appointments and removals.

Mr. FARIS. No; none when the Democrats are in authority, but only when the Republicans are. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BROSIUS. Not in any case. If my friend will read the law he will find that the only power they have is to investigate where they think proper, and make report, but they have nothing to do with the subject of removals.

Mr. FARIS. Exactly; and under the Democratic Administration they never "investigated" anything, but did just what the Democrats wanted them to do.

Mr. BROSIUS. That, of course, I know nothing at all about.

Mr. LANDIS. Well, Mr. Chairman, I trust that gentlemen will not become belligerent on this question. [Laughter.] I notice, however, that whenever anything is said that goes home and hurts, the "galled jade winces." [Laughter.] Why, take the Pension Department of this Government. When President Cleveland came in the second time, he had a lot of dirty work to do, and he wanted dirty men to do it. [Laughter.] Accordingly he turned out a lot of Republicans and put in a horde of Democrats, and sent them as special agents throughout the length and breadth of the land, tracking the footsteps of Union soldiers.

You know that just as well as I. He was so anxious to have everything in this line in harmony with his Administration that he changed the pension boards in all of the States, and even went so far, in some instances, for the purpose of making them solidly Democratic, as to rush mere boys through questionable medical schools on "ponies" and place them on examining boards in the various counties throughout the States. Hundreds and thousands of changes were made. Then he touched the button, and the members of the holy trinity composing the Civil Service Commission [laughter] responded. The blanket was thrown over the Pension Department, and upon it the legend was written, "The appointments in this department represent the merit system." Do they? In all honesty and fairness, do they?

Then take the Government Printing Office. When Mr. Cleveland was elected President the second time, he installed a man by the name of Benedict as Public Printer. Mr. Benedict brought with him into the office a private secretary named Albert Baker. In one day 735 Republicans were kicked out and as many Democrats put in their places. They distributed their discharges like compositors in newspaper offices distribute type. [Laughter.] That day is known throughout the Government Printing Office as "bloody Monday." [Laughter.] On a subsequent day 420 discharges were made. They kept on making changes until 1,800 Republicans were turned out, and most of the places were given to Democrats.

Then Grover Cleveland pressed the button, and those apostles of sweetness and light again responded [laughter], and the blanket was thrown over the Government Printing Office, and a legend inscribed thereon, "The appointments in this department represent the merit system." Do they? [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. No.

Mr. LANDIS. In all honesty and fairness, do they?

Several MEMBERS. No.

Mr. LANDIS. I made a call at the Government Printing Office the other day and was given access to the book I hold in my hand. It is the record kept by Albert Baker. He has written in red ink his reasons for discharging the Republicans who were dropped out day after day and month after month. His reasons are noted in red ink, an appropriate color. [Laughter.] I want to read to you some of the reasons for the discharge of these men by Mr. Baker and Mr. Benedict, who were preparing that great bureau for a baptism of the merit system. [Laughter.]

C. P. Armstrong, discharged June 13, 1894. Not wanted.

[Laughter.]

John F. Atkinson, discharged July 1, 1894. N. G. Lives in Indiana.

[Laughter.]

I want to say to the members of this House that I have known Mr. Atkinson for years. He comes from my Congressional district. When he received his discharge he was instructing three tyros in the printers' art, appointed by Mr. Benedict, one of them hailing from Georgia, another from Louisiana, and a third from Texas.

Mr. OGDEN. Well, the Louisiana man has gone out since Mr. Palmer has come in. I only had one man in there and Mr. Palmer has kicked him out since he came in.

Mr. LANDIS. I want them all to go unless they can pass a practical examination, and it would give me great pleasure if those who pass a practical examination under this Administration should be Republicans. [Laughter.] And I want to say that within thirty days after Mr. Atkinson was kicked out because he was inefficient he passed the civil-service examination placed before him by this Civil Service Commission, and graded 10 per cent higher than any other man who competed at that examination.

Mr. McEWAN. Then it was a good thing for him.

A MEMBER. No; he did not get in.

Mr. LANDIS. I will read further from this list.

Fred. Bogia, ruler, discharged July 1, 1894. Cranky Republican.

[Laughter.]

W. R. Burgess, compositor, discharged June 13, 1894. Trimmer. Joined the Old Dominion Republican Club.

Richard M. Calhoun, watchman, discharged June 13, 1894. Active and offensive in politics.

They were getting ready for the merit system. [Laughter.]

Blanche Carey, discharged June 19, 1894. Husband a lawyer.

[Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to say that that is the only sufficient excuse that I have heard. [Laughter.]

Mr. LANDIS. I know that may be true, but I claim that the mere fact that the girl in an unguarded moment had made a matrimonial alliance with an attorney should not have subjected her to the wrath even of Albert Baker.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Will my friend permit one question? Were those discharges made before or after the civil-service rules were applied to the office?

Mr. LANDIS. These discharges were made before the bureau went into the classified service.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I thought that was the fact, and I simply asked for information.

Mr. LANDIS. They were getting ready for the baptism of civil-service reform. [Laughter.]

C. Deering, forwarder, discharged September 22, 1894. Not grateful to P. P. Left in 1889.

Mr. FARIS. Poo Bah! [Laughter.]

Mr. LANDIS. For the information of the House, I will state that "P. P." stands for Public Printer. The Public Printer undoubtedly expected this young man to show gratitude; to come around possibly every night at midnight and ring his door bell and tell him he was much obliged.

George W. Engle, discharged June 13, 1894. In 1889 he would not shake hands with Mr. Benedict.

[Laughter.]

Mamie E. Fisher, discharged July 14, 1894. All her folks are solid Republicans.

John M. Gauntley, discharged June 19, 1894. Offensive Republican.

Mary E. Gorman, discharged June 9, 1894. Owns two houses; money at interest.

Mary was a plutocrat! [Laughter.]

John Green, jr., discharged June 1, 1894. Bitter Republican.

R. S. Peed, compositor, discharged June 2, 1894. Senator Turpie and Hon. T. Hammond.

Allie Basey Pitts, discharged June 2, 1894. Married and lives with her husband.

[Great laughter.]

It does not seem to have been considered the right thing in the Government Printing Office for a woman to live with her husband.

Mary E. Thorton, feeder, discharged November 12, 1894. Mother-in-law of Foss.

Now, I have known Mr. Foss ever since I have been in public life, and I know of no particular reason why the fact of her being his mother-in-law should call down upon her head the wrath of the Public Printer. [Laughter.]

James C. Toy, wagon messenger, discharged September 17, 1894. Not willing. Causes trouble. G. A. R.

[Cries of "Ah!" on the Republican side.]

A. E. Townsend, compositor, discharged May 18, 1895. Disorganizer. Not satisfied.

Think of a man who would not be satisfied in that butcher shop. [Laughter.]

John W. Usilton, discharged April 1, 1895. Agitator; charges P. P. dishonest and tyrant.

William Wilkins, laborer, discharged July 20, 1895. Offensive partisanship.

P. Wood, laborer, discharged March 6, 1895. Veteran and radical.

W. T. Johnson, finisher, discharged March 12, 1895. Trimmer, and abuses Democrats under Republican Administration.

M. E. McClain, discharged March 13, 1895. Daughter teacher in public schools.

[Laughter.]

Henry L. Mathers, compositor, discharged April 20, 1895. Agitator, trimmer; says he will be back in 1896 from Ohio as a Republican.

[Laughter.]

Mr. MOODY. Is he out or has he been put back?

Mr. LANDIS. I presume he is back, because if he is not he is the only Republican from Ohio that did not get back. [Laughter.]

Bertie K. Peters, folder, discharged April 3, 1895. Charged to Texas.

George P. Silence, laborer, discharged March 13, 1895. Anti-Democratic.

John Spicer, laborer, discharged March 20, 1895. Undertook to sell Gleason's place.

Simon P. Mast, watchman, discharged March 20, 1895. Drunk; undertook to sell Gleason's place.

Now, it seems here were two men, one sober, the other drunk. Both of them tried to sell Gleason's place, and both of them lost their positions. I should like to know what kind of a man could sell Gleason's place and at the same time retain the respect of the Public Printer?

George McCutcheon, discharged April 3, 1895. Veteran and vindictive.

Mr. BUTLER. He was a man from my district, and he is back in the place, where he should be.

Mr. LANDIS (reading):

Mary B. Dunbar, feeder, discharged April 18, 1895. Boarding house; father discharged before when I was here.

M. R. Dutton, compositor, discharged March 1, 1895. Critical of Public Printer.

Frank A. Everts, compositor, discharged March 13, 1895. He said: "All will get back in two years."

Alice Daly, discharged June 9, 1894. Not needed; daughter in Department; soldier's widow.

Soldier's widow! Hurled from public place because she was the widow of a soldier. Union or Confederate it does not specify. I do not care; that is all over now; but I believe we all agree that the wives, the mothers, the daughters, the sisters in that awful fratricidal war were all heroines. It remained for a hyena preparing a great Government bureau for a baptism of civil-service reform to cast aspersion and brand with condemnation those whom honest men, brave men, and generous men the world over regard as the sainted legion of this Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. MAGUIRE. Will the gentleman read the memorandum following that name again?

Mr. LANDIS (reading). "Alice Daly, discharged June 9, 1894. Not needed; daughter in Department; soldier's widow."

There are three books like these that were kept by Mr. Baker; one would not hold them all. The other two are in the Public Printing Office. I brought this along in order that gentlemen might see how the books were kept.

Mr. PERKINS. I would like to inquire of the gentleman if he thinks the Government Printing Office ought to be returned to that system? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. LANDIS. No; and we are not contending that it should be. We are asking, however, that you modify the system.

Mr. HENDERSON. If the gentleman will allow me, I have been looking for the name of a soldier that I had in the Government Printing Office by the name of B. P. Entrikin, and the entry here is "Resigned June 30, 1894." Now, that is a lie, and I call attention to it because if the other statements are as unreliable as that is, none of them can be reliable. This man was appointed by Mr. Palmer on my recommendation and promoted once, until he got $1,400. His wife died, leaving four children on his hands, and he came to me when I was on my back, and I wrote an appeal to the Government Printer and tried to save him. He had been ordered to resign. I told him not to leave his place until he was driven out.

Senator GEAR, at my request, went personally to see the Government Printer, and was insulted and told to mind his own business. Entrikin's head was cut off. He never resigned. He was the only old soldier who held a desk in the Government Printing Office, and when he was removed his place was filled by one of my old friend Joe Wheeler's cavalry. The record in this book is a lie, and I brand it as such. Do not misunderstand me. Mr. Palmer never did that, and the people, the guardians of civil service reform, turned down the brutal headsman and put the men into power to enforce a righteous law—the civil-service law. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. LANDIS. Do you think——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BROSIUS. Mr. Chairman, I have interrupted the gentleman from Indiana somewhat, and I desire to ask consent that his time be extended until he can conclude his remarks.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to object to the extension of the gentleman's time, but I think some limit ought to be fixed, as there are gentlemen on this side who desire to speak to-day.

Mr. BROSIUS. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. LANDIS. I think half an hour will be sufficient.

Mr. BROSIUS. Make the limit thirty minutes, then.

Mr. LANDIS. I will say, Mr. Chairman, that I am speaking on the time of Mr. HEMENWAY, who is a member of the Committee on Appropriations, and my understanding was that he had an hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROSIUS] asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Indiana be extended thirty minutes.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman, I do not understand the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] as indorsing a merit system that was prepared as this was prepared.

Mr. HENDERSON. I simply want not to be understood as conceding that the brutal performances in the Government Printing Office in the days of Benedict—Benedict Arnold, he should be called—or that the administration of any law by a thoroughly bad man is a test of the law itself. I condemn Benedict and his methods, but I do not condemn an effort by the lawmakers to give the merit system a fair test and a fair administration. While I condemn the things that have been done in the Government Printing Office, I do not want to be misunderstood as indorsing any attack upon the civil-service law. [Applause.]

Mr. LANDIS. You do not want to be understood, however, as being in favor of a merit system that keeps in public places Democrats who were put in as these men were put in, do you?

Mr. HENDERSON. I am in favor of the merit system and of a law that will protect it, but I do not accept such crimes as you have described, and as have been committed by a bad man, as indicating any defect in the law.

Mr. LANDIS. He was a good enough man, however, to have his society courted by the members of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not know anything about that. That is mere talk.

Mr. LANDIS. And they approved his action, too.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Civil Service Commission is but one branch of the Government, and it has its difficulties, and you know, and God knows, that its difficulties were great enough when the Cleveland Administration was trying to break down the barriers of the civil-service law. I guess some of them did the best they could. Let us strengthen the law and the proper administration of it and not assail one of the most meritorious efforts to purify Government that ever was enacted into law. [Applause.]

Mr. LANDIS. That is what we are trying to do. [Applause.] You can count on the fingers on one of your hands the members on this side of this Chamber who are in favor of the absolute repeal of the civil-service law. What we are contending for is the correction of these abuses and these outrages. [Applause.]

Mr. HENDERSON. I am with you on that.

Mr. LANDIS. We propose that they shall be corrected; and if this Congress does not correct them, the people, shod with indignation and clothed with wrath, will send a Congress here that will correct them. [Applause.]

Mr. HENDERSON. I should like to say, if my friend will allow me, that in my judgment——

Mr. LANDIS. I shall want my time extended.

Mr. HENDERSON. Just a word. In my judgment, the Congress that stabs and destroys the civil-service law will never be returned to this body.

Mr. LANDIS. How about a Congress that corrects these abuses?

Mr. HENDERSON. That is another thing.

Mr. LANDIS. That is what we are after.

Mr. HENDERSON. But you have not named an abuse yet in this debate that it is not within the prerogative and power of the Chief Executive to correct—not one.

Mr. LANDIS. Well, they are not corrected.

Mr. HENDERSON. He can not do everything in a day.

Mr. LANDIS. I do not think he knows of these abuses.

Mr. HENDERSON. Well, we will let him know.

Mr. LANDIS. That is what I am after now.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will join the gentleman myself in letting him know. I hope the gentleman's time will be extended.

Mr. LANDIS. I shall have a copy of my remarks sent to the President's address to-morrow morning. [Laughter.]

I am satisfied that the Chief Executive of this nation will correct these abuses, because he is an honest man, he is a sincere man; and when his attention is called to these outrages, my judgment is that he will have a sitting with the members of the Civil Service Commission.

I want to show that that Government Printing Office was prepared for this baptism as a result of a conspiracy between Mr. Benedict and the leaders of the Democratic party.

A MEMBER. And the President.

Mr. LANDIS. And the President of the United States—the then President.

I hold in my hand a letter written by a distinguished Senator from California, which is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 19, 1894.

Hon. T. E. BENEDICT,
Public Printer, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Representing the California delegation, I desire to make the following recommendations, pursuant to your suggestion.

You forwarded me a list of parties now in the Printing Office and charged to California, as follows.

Then follows the list.

I have consulted the delegation with reference to these persons, and, while we regret to drop anyone, still, if we can not obtain places for friends whom we recommend without doing so, we will suggest that the following be dropped.

Then follow the names of the persons to be dropped.

"Pursuant to your suggestion!" Whose suggestion? Public Printer Benedict's suggestion. And after these places were changed—Republicans kicked out and Democrats put in their places—then the commission came along; the mantle was thrown over the Public Printing Bureau, and the same old legend inscribed: "The appointments of this department represent the merit system."

Now, as to Mr. Baker. As soon as Mr. Palmer came back the first thing he did was to kick Albert Baker, the official headsman under Mr. Benedict, out of public place. Did he remain out of public place? No. Immediately after he was discharged there was the rustle of silken gowns in the sanctum sanctorum of the Civil Service Commission. "To the rescue of Baker!" He was reinstated, transferred to the Treasury Department, where he has a brother as chief of a division, from there to the Civil Service Commission, where he to-day sits near the throne, equally dividing his time between burning incense to those gods in the flesh and grading the manuscripts sent in by Republicans ambitious to hold office under this Republican Administration. [Laughter and applause.]

He is the man who made that notation opposite the name of the veteran to whom the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] has referred. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] said the commission did not indorse such work. Why, then, did they call for Baker to be sent to them and given a place right in the same room with them? [Applause.]

Merit system! Merit system! What a burlesque! What a sham! What a cheat! What a fraud! There is a man in this city to-day—I heard of him yesterday—a veteran Union soldier—who was given a position by Benjamin Harrison. Mr. Cleveland became President of the United States, and one of Mosby's guerrillas wanted his place. The Mosby guerrilla passed a plate in Mr. Cleveland's church. He was given the position and the Union soldier turned out. And soon after Mosby's man was given the position the blanket was extended and this legend inscribed on it: "The appointments in this Department represent the merit system." [Laughter and applause.] Do they?

I am opposed to this law as now construed and enforced because the examinations are absurd and farcical. This law, as I understand it, provides that these examinations shall be practical, shall be a fair test of the fitness of the applicants to hold the employment which they seek under the Government. I hold in my hand a schedule of examinations and instructions to applicants for positions in the classified civil service, revised to July 1, 1897. This is the pure article, distilled through fourteen years of civil-service reform. It combines the pink of the seashell with the odor of sweet violets. [Laughter.] Suppose that Terry Lamb, in Delphi, Ind., wants to be appointed a janitor. According to this revised edition, he sends for information and receives one of these documents. He turns to the index and finds, "Janitor." That refers him to page 188. Page 188 refers him to page 229. There he learns that in order to be a janitor he must pass an examination in spelling, arithmetic, letter-writing, penmanship, and copying from plain copy. Three consecutive hours are allowed for this examination, and on each branch he is given a "weight." For explanation of weight, see section 61.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us go a little further, and I ask you to listen to the explanation of "weights" as used in this connection.

Section 61 of this report provides:

EXPLANATION OF WEIGHTS.

SEC. 61. The various subjects in every examination are weighted according to their relative importance. The weights represent the ratio of each subject to the whole examination. The method of obtaining the general average in an examination is as follows:

SEC. 62. Multiply the average obtained on each subject by the relative weight of that subject, add the products, and divide the sum of the products by the sum of the relative weights. In the case of auxiliary examinations the general average in the basis examination is first obtained, and this general average is used as a subject in the auxiliary part of the examination.

[Laughter.]

That is lucid. [Laughter.]

SEC. 63. To obtain the general average on the basis and auxiliary subjects combined the following method is used: Multiply the general average in the basis by the relative weight of the basis, and multiply the general average of each auxiliary subject by its relative weight; add the products thus obtained, and divide the sum by the sum of the relative weights of the auxiliary subjects and basis.

[Laughter and applause.]

For real rippling lucidity and comprehensive incomprehensibility I do not think there is a normal institution in the United States that could discount that provision. [Laughter and applause.] And after Terry Lamb had been chased through that maze, that labyrinth of technicality, which end of the shovel do you suppose he would take hold of? [Laughter and applause.]

But that is not all. The examination proceeds beyond that point. He has got to learn how to spell. Remember, this man is ambitious to be a janitor. [Laughter.] Next he is taken up and examined in arithmetic. After being asked some questions in addition and subtraction and the ordinary rules of arithmetic, he is given this proposition:

A book agent bought 90 books at $2.75 each. He sold all of them at $4.50 each. His expenses were $12.25. He was unable to collect the money for 3 books. What was his net gain?

[Laughter and applause.]

I doubt the intelligence of any man in this House who would not say that that is a fair examination for a janitor. [Laughter.] Here is another question:

A locomotive traveled 287 miles on Monday, 307 miles on Tuesday, and 38 miles less on Wednesday than on Monday. What is the total number of miles traveled in the three days?

[Laughter.]

Answer that, Terry, or you can not be a janitor. [Laughter.]

But he has something else to do. He is asked to write a letter. He is examined in penmanship. Remember, now, he wants to be a janitor, and they examine him in penmanship. There is a distinguished civil service reformer, now holding a high office in the Navy Department under this Administration, who wrote a letter to a friend of mine in Indiana a number of years ago, and he tried to read it, but failed. He called a number of his friends together, and they went into committee of the whole and tried to decipher this manuscript without avail.

I was present and we wrestled with the matter for nearly three hours, and then gave it up. [Laughter.] We were undecided whether it was an invitation to a wedding, an announcement of the death of a dear friend, or a lurid description of the aurora borealis. [Laughter.] And if, to get a place in the Navy Department, he had had to pass an examination in penmanship, this man could not have secured a position as powder monkey on the training ship at the Annapolis Academy. [Laughter.]

I might pursue this matter indefinitely, but do not wish to weary the House with a recital of these facts. I will read one more question that was asked of a man who was ambitious to fill the position of a pension examiner. Here is a question that he must answer:

During the year of 365 days the total amount paid for gaslight by the inhabitants of a certain city was $2,784,453.60. There were 27,640 houses in the city, averaging 6 rooms each, and for every 3 rooms there were 5 gas burners, each consuming 6 cubic feet an hour, and burning for 4 hours each night. What was the cost per thousand cubic feet?

[Laughter and applause.]

That is a question asked in the examination of a man who is to be a pension examiner. Now, if this man wanted to be a plumber, or a gas fitter, or wanted to kick on his gas bill, this would be relevant. [Laughter.] How absurd, how ridiculous!

I am against this for another reason. That is, that its logical sequence is the establishment of a civil pension list. Gentlemen on the other side hoot at this idea. They say this can not be. This already is! Such a list was established in the Treasury Department two months ago. I hold in my hand a copy of a letter written by the Secretary of the Treasury, November 17, 1897, in which he reduces a clerk to the $900 roll and gives him to understand that he is to be pensioned at $75 a month for the rest of his life. I understand about 100 such letters were written. The distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] commented upon Mr. Vanderlip's interview relative to this letter, and I will ask unanimous consent to insert both Mr. Vanderlip's interview and this letter in the RECORD. The following is the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury:

HONORABLE SERVICE ROLL.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., November 17, 1897.

Mr. ——— ———,
Clerk of Class ———, Office of ———.

SIR: I have to advise you that, after a careful consideration of the needs of the public service as related to the office in which you are now employed, it appears to be necessary to make some important changes to accelerate public business and to promote efficiency in the service.

In doing this it is proposed to place your name and the history of your service for the many years during which you have been related to the Government's administration upon the honorable-service roll, a roll established to recognize and commemorate long and faithful service.

It would be a pleasure, were it possible, to announce also an increase in, or at least a continuation of, your present rate of remuneration, but the present exigencies of the public service seem to require that you be transferred and appointed a clerk of class —, with compensation at the rate of $——, in the office of ——— ———, to take effect from ———, ——.

It is hoped and believed that with this modification your official duties may be made less arduous and that the disabilities incident to advancing years may not prevent this Department from still securing the benefit of your knowledge and experience for an extended period.

Respectfully, yours, L. J. GAGE, Secretary.

The following is the interview with Mr. Vanderlip, as published in the Washington Post:

AGED CLERKS REDUCED—MOVEMENT TO INCREASE TREASURY EFFICIENCY—AMOUNTS TO A PENSION SCHEME—EMPLOYEES OVER 70 YEARS OF AGE HOLDING HIGHER POSITIONS WILL BE CUT DOWN TO $900—OFFICIALS WILL BE LAX WITH THEM AND SMALL PRIVILEGES WILL BE ALLOWED—NEED OF NEW BLOOD IS FELT—A DELICATE MATTER.

A movement which it is believed will result in adding to the efficiency of the working force of the Treasury Department has been inaugurated by the officials of that branch of the Government service. The plan is practically a pension scheme for the old employees who have become infirm from service.

This scheme, to be carried out within the law, has been so arranged that the veteran clerks of both sexes will remain in harness, but all over 70 years of age shall be reduced to $900 per annum and given light work. When seen last night, Assistant Secretary Vanderlip explained the plan in detail to a reporter for the Post.

"It is a very delicate matter," he said. "The facts are, though, that there are a large number of clerks in the Treasury Department who, while deserving much credit for their work and service of the past, have outgrown their usefulness. The tree has become dead at the top, as it were. In one Auditor's office we found that a majority of the clerks employed there are over 50 years of age and that the office is badly in need of young blood.

"This condition of affairs is a menace to the civil service. These people are allowed to hold high positions and draw big salaries while their work is not up to the standard of younger employees drawing smaller salaries. It is a hard thing for the old men to realize that their usefulness is fading, and it is also hard to expect a bureau chief to tell the old men they must get out. They simply won't do it.

HONORARY SERVICE ROLL.

"We have been thinking the matter over and have decided on applying somewhat the same lines to the Treasury as hold in the Army, police, and fire departments; for instance, a form of compulsory retirement, or as near that as we can get. There is no law allowing us to retire clerks on half pay, and it would be too much of a hardship to turn the old people out entirely. In looking around to see what we could do in the matter we have had in view the thought of an honorary service roll, on which all the employees, men and women, over 70 years of age will be placed.

"It will be known that the officials will be lax with these people. If the old man has an attack of rheumatism, or something else detains him and he gets to the office a trifle late, why nothing will be said. There is no law allowing us to give them shorter hours, but it will be known that everything will be made as comfortable as possible for them.

"They will be given $900 a year, or a practical pension of $75 per month, which will enable all to live comfortably. There is naturally much objection to the rule. None will be convinced of the fact that they are getting old, and will insist that their long service makes them all the more fit for their respective positions. A few have voluntarily accepted the situation, but a majority are, of course, objecting.

UNIFORM RULE BETTER.

"Whether the rule will be generally enforced or not has not been decided. There are some men at 70 who are still efficient. But, on the other hand, if we discriminate some of the older ones will bring in pressure to show that they are just as good as the other fellow. It would be better to have a uniform rule for all over 70, but we have not fully made up our minds on that point.

"We have talked with the Civil Service Commission and with numerous Congressmen on the subject, and they all agree that it is a good thing.

"There are sixty or seventy employees over 70 years old in the Department. We are trying to do the best we can by the faithful clerks, and at the same time to add to the efficiency of the service."

There is much rejoicing at the Department among the young clerks over the prospect of nearly seventy promotions, but the older ones are not in the best frame of mind over the matter.

Gentlemen who oppose any modification of this law say that it is not necessary that this should mean the establishment of a civil pension list. I say the establishment of such a list is the logical sequence of life tenure in office. I do not want to be understood as criticising the Secretary of the Treasury for writing that letter, for making these reductions, for establishing what he calls an honorable service roll. Were I Secretary of the Treasury, as he is, and these old people who have been in the Government employ were to come to me begging and pleading that they be not turned out in hunger, in want, turned out with no place to go but the poorhouse, I would say, "I will not turn you out. I will keep you, but reduce you"—just as the honorable Secretary of the Treasury said when he issued this order and wrote this letter. If you, my distinguished colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROSIUS], were Secretary of the Treasury, and old people who had been in the Government service all their lives should come to you and show you that if they were discharged there was no place for them but the poorhouse, would you discharge them, notwithstanding they were inefficient?

Mr. BROSIUS. Do you address that inquiry to me?

Mr. LANDIS. Yes.

Mr. BROSIUS. I am not able to say what I should do in that case.

Mr. LANDIS. Why, of course you would not, because you are a man of conscience and of sympathy. But you must accept modifications of this law or else you must sanction the establishment of this honorable service roll now established in the Treasury Department.

Mr. BROSIUS. If my friend will allow me, I do not want to seem to acquiesce in a proposition that I do not believe in. I did not quite understand whether the inquiry was whether I indorsed the action of the Treasury Department in reducing old clerks to inferior positions at inferior salaries—salaries commensurate with the work which they could do. I think that was a very wise thing to do. That is a proposition that has been discussed a great deal for years, and this is the first time it has been proposed. It is not in the nature of a pension at all, but it is reducing them to work that they are able to perform, they meanwhile, of course, returning to the Government an equivalent for the salaries which they receive, while younger and more active men are promoted.

Mr. LANDIS. But suppose they reach that point in their careers where they are practically valueless to the Government?

Mr. BROSIUS. Well, I want to say to my friend——

Mr. LANDIS. I do not push the question.

Mr. BROSIUS. I do not want you to withdraw the question, because I prefer to say a word in reply. It is very easy for any one of us to seem to be placed in a wrong attitude on this subject, and I am very desirous not to be, because that has been a difficulty throughout the history of our service. Men will grow old in the service, and we have been trying to arrive at some mode of getting rid of them in a proper way. I agree with my friend——

Mr. LANDIS. Men grow old in the law, too.

Mr. BROSIUS. Oh, they do. I say it is not the business of the Government to take care of old men. If we look at it from the personal point of view, my friend will easily see that our humanity is very strongly appealed to.

Mr. LANDIS. Yes.

Mr. BROSIUS. And the Department officers have allowed themselves to be influenced by that consideration. If we looked at it from the service point of view, why, we should dispense with their services as soon as they became inefficient.

Mr. LANDIS. As I have said, this civil pension list is the logical sequence of this system of life tenure. It is as sure to come as night is sure to follow day. I would correct it. I would relieve the people of this burden by fixing a limited tenure. I would do this not only in justice to the Republic, but in justice to these employees, who from necessity must become wards of the Government or be turned out upon the streets as beggars in their old age.

I am further opposed to this law as now construed and enforced because it is not enforced in letter and in spirit.

One of the provisions of this law is that these offices must be distributed to the States, Territories, and District of Columbia in proportion to their population. I hold in my hand an exhibit given me by a gentleman who has access to the books and is familiar with the facts, from which I can show you that at the present time Connecticut has 34 in excess of her quota, Delaware 21, Maine 17, New Hampshire 1, New Jersey 21, New York 30, Vermont 26, West Virginia 34, Virginia 268, Maryland 321, and the District of Columbia 2,357.

Mr. MOODY. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. LANDIS. Certainly.

Mr. MOODY. Is the gentleman referring to positions within or without the classified list?

Mr. LANDIS. I am referring to positions within the classified service.

Mr. MOODY. I think the figures given by the gentleman are a mistake, and I think the gentleman will find that they are a mistake.

Mr. LANDIS. They were given to me by a gentleman who certainly is an authority on the subject.

Mr. MOODY. If you examine the executive civil service of the United States you will find that under the rule of apportionment that is practically carried on in the unclassified service the figures are those which the gentleman has stated, and that the District of Columbia has more than 2,000 places over the amount that would be allotted to them if the rule of apportionment were applied.

Mr. LANDIS. These figures were given to me as the excess of the District of Columbia and those other States in the classified service. And I say this, that notwithstanding this excess appointments have recently been made by the Civil Service Commission from the District of Columbia, and they are still being made.

Mr. PEARSON. And have been since 1883.

Mr. LANDIS. And have been since 1883. And how many people there are holding positions in the District of Columbia who were born in the District of Columbia and have never lived anywhere else, but who are credited to different States, no man under the heavens knows.

I found a young woman the other day on the eligible list, giving her residence as Montgomery County, in my district. She never lived in Montgomery County in her life. She was born in the District of Columbia. She visited there once, and is now on the eligible list, about to be certified, and accredited to the Ninth Indiana district. I found in one of the Departments the other day a young woman accredited to the little city in which I live. I had never heard of her, and I had lived in Delphi for twelve years. I learned that twenty years ago her father had lived there. Her father wanted to hold a Government office, and they moved to the District of Columbia nearly a quarter of a century ago. She passed an examination two years ago, and gave as her residence Delphi, Ind. How many such cases there are I do not think any man can approximate.

Mr. MOODY. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the exact figures as I find them in this document. When the act of 1883 went into effect the District of Columbia had an excess of appointments of ninety-six. The only difference is in respect to the rest of the service, and the excess which the District of Columbia has had in that is 2,357; but the gentleman well knows that in the civil service each State and Territory has had substantially what it is entitled to under the rule of apportionment, and it is outside of the civil service where the District of Columbia has so great an excess.

Mr. LANDIS. It is undoubtedly true that they got into the civil service, and they are accredited to different States, when they actually live in the District of Columbia.

Mr. MOODY. That ought not to be.

Mr. DOVENER. Will the gentleman tell me a single place that is not under the civil service in those that have been accredited to West Virginia?

Mr. MOODY. West Virginia, under the act of 1883, is entitled to 50 appointments. It has 48, and is entitled to 2 more, according to this report, made last year.

Mr. DOVENER. That unclassified part.

Mr. MOODY. In the unclassified list West Virginia has an excess of 34.

Mr. DOVENER. There is not a single one occupying any of those places that can be removed, because they are under the civil service. Not a single one.

Mr. MOODY. I think the gentleman will find the statement I have made to be true, if he investigates.

I mean to say that the appointments that have been made since the act of 1883 went into effect and under that act have been made in accordance with the rule of apportionment. I have no doubt that men have been covered into the civil service in sufficient numbers to somewhat destroy the proportion. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. LANDIS. I want to ask the gentleman this question: If the District of Columbia, when the system was introduced, went into the classified service with two thousand and some odd hundreds in excess of its quota, was it in accordance with the letter or the spirit of the law to give the District additional appointments?

Mr. MOODY. Certainly not.

Mr. LANDIS. Then the Civil Service Commission is violating the law.

Mr. MOODY. Certainly they are in that respect.

Mr. LANDIS. And they should not do so.

Mr. MOODY. Certainly not. [Laughter.]

Mr. LANDIS. That is the evil that we are trying to correct.

Mr. MOODY. I will help the gentleman.

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman, the point that I wanted to make was this, that according to the report of the Civil Service Commission the District of Columbia has now 2,357 appointments to Government places in excess of its quota. Indiana's share of those 2,357 is 93 places. Seven of those places, according to the construction of this law given by the Civil Service Commission, belong to my Congressional district.

I want them. [Laughter.] I do not want them as a spoilsman; I want them as a civil-service reformer [laughter] in favor of the enforcement of this law. Mr. Chairman, you can not go to a corner or a nook in any part of Washington without stumbling over violations of this law. You do not have to hunt for them; they present themselves at every corner. We want the law modified, gentlemen, and in all seriousness you must consent to its modification. You must consent to its modification if you would save any vestige of this law. If you do not, a Congress and a President will come to Washington who will destroy it root and branch. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him just a moment?

Mr. LANDIS. Nothing would give me greater pleasure.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. My friend said that he was in favor of a modification of the civil-service law. In what respect does he favor its modification?

Mr. LANDIS. I will answer that in a moment. Why, according to the interpretation of the gentlemen who back this law and defend it, the changes in and modifications of it are entirely in the hands of the Executive. It is merely a matter of discretion with the President of the United States.

Do you not think this a dangerous discretion to place in the hands of one man? He does not have to have the consent of the Senate or of the House of Representatives. The Senate of the United States and this branch of Congress may be Republican, but a Democratic President may be elected and in a second, with one stroke of his pen, he could nullify that law absolutely. And, Mr. Chairman, if he did that, this Civil Service Commission, if permitted to hold their jobs, would sanction it. [Laughter.]

I am opposed to this law for another reason, and that is, that it discredits political parties.

Mr. BROSIUS. Will the gentleman allow me to interrogate him for a moment?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I trust the gentleman will give my colleague [Mr. LANDIS] an opportunity to define what he means by a modification of the law. I want him to reach that point without interruption.

Mr. BROSIUS. I was intending to afford the gentleman a further opportunity of suggesting how he would modify the law, and in order to do so I will read what the law says, and then will ask him how he would improve upon it.

Mr. LANDIS. If the gentleman pleases——

Mr. BROSIUS. It will take just a minute. The law says:

> Appointments to the public service aforesaid in the Departments at Washington shall be apportioned among the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia upon the basis of population as ascertained at the last preceding census.

How would my friend improve that?

Mr. LANDIS. But the Civil Service Commission have not followed that out. According to their own report the District of Columbia has an excess of 2,377 places.

Mr. BROSIUS. But after my friend has amended the law, after all he will have only a law, and he can not make the commission enforce that law any more than he can make them enforce the existing one.

Mr. LANDIS. That is all right, but I would go back and would put out some of those people who were put in simply because they were Democrats.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. How about the men who were put in simply because they were Republicans?

Mr. LANDIS. If they could pass practical examinations I would let them remain, if they were efficient. [Laughter.]

Mr. OGDEN. Let me ask the gentleman a question. When this civil-service system started, in 1883, were not they all Republicans who went in under the law?

Mr. LANDIS. I do not remember.

Mr. OGDEN. The gentleman has a bad memory.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Would the gentleman do the same thing with a Democrat in office who has proved his efficiency?

Mr. LANDIS. My distinguished colleague is asking a leading question. [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this law, lastly, because it discredits political parties. I mean that I am opposed to this law as now enforced because it discredits political parties. I believe in political parties. I believe that they are the standing armies of peace in a republican form of government. I believe they are our Government's surest protection against crazes and fads and political hysterics. [Laughter.] I say I believe in political parties. First of all, I believe in the Republican party, and after that I believe in the Democratic party. By the Democratic party I do not want to be understood as referring to the Bryan party.

A MEMBER. That is all there is now.

Mr. LANDIS. I refer to that party as it was before it was captured by the tambourine players and serpentine dancers who went crazy over "a crown of thorns and a cross of gold" at the Chicago convention. [Laughter.] I refer to the old Democratic party that traces its traditions back to the sages of Monticello and the Hermitage. I do not refer to that party whose brightest, most conspicuous representative is a candidate for office on a sure financial guaranty in times of political war, and on the same basis divides with Hereford cattle and "the wild child of Borneo" the admiration of county fairs in times of political peace. [Laughter.] I refer to the old Democratic party.

I say I believe in political parties and am opposed to this law as now construed and enforced, because it discredits political parties and reflects upon men who take active interest in party organizations.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Would the gentleman in his proposed modification of this law wipe out competitive examinations?

Mr. LANDIS. No. I will come to that matter in a few moments.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Would the gentleman make it impossible for an officer to hold his place so long as he possessed the mental, physical, and moral qualifications to discharge the duties of his office?

Mr. LANDIS. I cover that point in a paper which I have prepared representing my ideas, which I shall read.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Would the gentleman confine his officeholders to persons of the same political party as the appointing power?

Mr. LANDIS. I should not be surprised if I would. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. The gentleman has been kind enough to give me a direct answer to one of my questions. Will he put me under additional obligations by giving me a direct answer also to the first two questions I asked him? I want to locate him. I want to see whether his "modification" would amount to an extinguishment of the law.

Mr. LANDIS. Oh, no.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Will not the gentleman let the House and the country determine that by stating distinctly whether his proposed "modification" would wipe out the competitive system of examination in order to determine whether or not a man is fit for office?

Mr. LANDIS. It would take some time to answer that question.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. It is a simple question. The gentleman can readily answer "yes" or "no."

Mr. LANDIS. If the gentleman will come to the door of the Interstate Commerce Committee this evening, we will hand him the draft of a law that will largely represent our ideas on this subject. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I should like to have the gentleman's statement now, so as to know where he stands. Certainly he has in his own mind a clear idea of the modification he wants to make. I wish to locate him.

Mr. LANDIS. There is no exertion I would not make in order to render the gentleman happy.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. If the gentleman will answer my question, he will place me under great obligations.

Mr. LANDIS. I really must decline just now. It would take too much time. I have already trespassed upon the good nature of the House.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Very well; I will not press the gentleman further.

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman, I believe in political parties. I believe they are the standing armies of peace in a republican form of government. I believe in the party worker. I like the party worker. I am one of those who believe in standing up for him away from home when not a candidate for office as well as at home when a candidate for office. [Applause.] I like the party worker because he is generally keen, bright, active, and alert. I like him because he represents the sentiment of the community in which he lives, however small it may be; otherwise he would not be selected to represent them. He knows the people's sympathies. He is acquainted with the people's wants. You can depend upon his judgment.

Take Indiana, for instance. I am familiar with her politics during the last quarter of a century, and I tell you that in the political organizations of our townships, counties, districts, and State the best blood, the best brain, the best enthusiasm, the best citizenship is represented on the township, county, district, and State committees. [Applause.] And what is true of Indiana is true of the other States of this Union. These party workers are good men, brave men, courageous men. Parties being essential to a republican government, coincident with the birth of the Republic, fundamental with the Constitution, the party worker is the country's best friend in time of peace; and in time of war he would be the man to organize a company in his township, a regiment in his county, and a brigade in his Congressional district. [Applause.] And that is the reason I like him.

He represents the best citizenship of the community in which he lives. Continue to discredit him, continue referring to all these men who take active interest in party politics as "spoilsmen," give out the idea that they are dangerous men, bad men, men who can not be trusted, and the time is not far distant when Congressional conventions will be rich men's reunions and the Senate of the United States and House of Representatives little better than bankers' clubs. [Great applause.]

I know, for I have been a party worker in the trenches, in the counties, in the townships in my State, since I have been old enough to take part in politics—I know well that the people I then associated with in that connection were the very best people in my country. [Applause.] The professional civil-service reformer, who is responsible for the perversion of this system and the destruction of this great principle, is the child of the Pharisee. He would have us believe that public service is a reproach, political ambition an infamy, political success the epitaph of self-respect; and yet, Mr. Chairman, these people are always holding office themselves. [Laughter and applause.]

They are never supremely happy unless they are writing reform

philippics on Government stationery with one hand and affixing their signatures to the Government pay roll with the other. [Laughter.] You know that is true. [Laughter.] He is the monopolist of wisdom, the self-constituted guardian of the integrity and conscience of Christendom, the gentle shepherd of hope and progress. His library is the rich and fertile garden wherein the fad blooms and blossoms. His best argument is a sneer; to him history is a lamentation; with him public and private virtue begin and end. He has sinking chills when he thinks that possibly some time the world will have to get along without him. He is unreasonable, unjust, bigoted, selfish, and malicious. [Applause.]

Mr. RIDGELY. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RIDGELY. The time extended by the committee to the gentleman who is now occupying the floor has long since expired.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that on request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROSIUS] the time of the gentleman was extended indefinitely.

Mr. BROSIUS. Mr. Chairman, that request was originally submitted, but objection was made, and subsequently a request was made to extend the time thirty minutes, which, as I understand, was acceded to.

Mr. LANDIS. I shall occupy but a very few moments longer in concluding my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the Chair was of the opinion that the time had been extended indefinitely.

Mr. BROSIUS. Objection was made, and it was modified so as to extend to the gentleman thirty minutes' additional time. I have been so much interested that I was not aware that that time had passed.

Mr. LANDIS. The gentleman from Pennsylvania flatters me most highly. That is the first compliment I have ever received from a gentleman who is opposed to the modification of this law. [Laughter.]

And in order that I shall not forget it, I desire to say in this connection——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman, as the Chair understands it, has expired.

Mr. OGDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended for ten minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. The time has already been extended, the Chair will state——

Mr. PEARSON. I move that it be extended for five minutes longer.

Mr. OGDEN. Let it be for ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the time of the gentleman be extended for ten minutes longer. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANDIS. Now, Mr. Chairman, in order not to be misunderstood, I have jotted down briefly what modifications of this law I would favor.

I have introduced no bill, neither have I any plan systematized representing the modifications I would make in this law. In general terms, however, I would have it embody the following ideas: First of all, I would undo the work of the Logan Carlisle and Albert Baker crowd. I would then have the appointment of chiefs of divisions, private secretaries, chief clerks, and those whose relations are of a confidential nature entirely free from legislative restriction. I would fix a limited tenure of office of, say, six or seven years for employees in the various Departments, placing in the hands of the heads of Departments the power to reappoint such employees as are essential to the efficiency of the service.

I would apportion the offices, in fact and in truth, to each Congressional district, Territory, and the District of Columbia, and I would not have the law, by implication or otherwise, discredit active interest in party politics. I would make all appointments probationary. If, at the end of the probationary period, the appointee proved efficient and demonstrated the same before an examining board in the Department in which he was employed, he would then be appointed for the full term, at the expiration of which he would leave the Government service.

As an evidence of good faith and to retain his residence, I would make it obligatory upon every male officeholder outside of the District of Columbia to return to his home at every Congressional election and vote, thus emphasizing the fact that the accredited resident of a State who does not take enough interest in politics and his country to vote is not qualified to hold office. [Loud applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question, since his time has been extended? I want to ask a plain question——

Mr. LANDIS. I regret that I can not yield to my colleague.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. The House, by courtesy, extended the gentleman's time, and I hope, since he has had practically unlimited time, that he will allow me to ask him a question bearing directly upon the argument he has made.

Mr. LANDIS. I regret that I can not occupy further the time of the House.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. But your time has been extended.

Mr. LANDIS. The House has been too kind to me.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Well, I think so myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman, I hold that we who stand here pleading for a modification of this law as now construed and enforced are the true civil-service reformers; and if you gentlemen who are opposing modification would have any part of this law or this principle retained, you will join us in the effort to get such modifications. The true civil-service reformers, in order to protect this law and this principle against absolute eradication, must rescue it from the hands of the zealots to whom it has been committed for years past. Take it from their hands, wrest it from their clutch and from the consequences of their rapacious folly.

Modify this law, correct the outrages I have exposed and others have exposed, carry out this principle so as to bring it in harmony with the faith of the fathers and close to the hearts of the people. Do this, and you will save the principle. Fail to do this, and you will lose the principle. Do this, bring it closer to the people, and you will make stronger patriots of the people. Were I asked to give the definition of a patriot, I would say he is the man who carries a gun in time of war and takes an active interest in party politics in time of peace. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word to the committee. It is very evident that if the time is continued indefinitely to the various speakers many gentlemen who desire to be heard will fail of the opportunity. I desire to give notice, therefore, that hereafter, within reasonable degrees, I shall object to any extension of time, so that all may have an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. DOCKERY. I hope the gentleman will adhere to that resolution.

Mr. GREENE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. GREENE] is recognized for twenty minutes.

Mr. GREENE. Mr. Chairman, it has been quite amusing to listen to the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. LANDIS]. I have listened during the long speech which the distinguished gentleman has made, and I have earnestly endeavored to find out where he stands on the question of civil-service reform. I confess that at this moment I know less about his attitude than I did before he opened his mouth, except as I have gleaned it from his artful dodging when questions were propounded to him by gentlemen on that side of the House. I am constrained to believe, however, that he is in favor of the spoils system, pure and simple.

He has frankly admitted that if it were under his control he would place Republicans on guard. That simply means that if he were managing the affair he would return to the spoils system as it existed prior to 1883. The amusing part of the gentleman's argument is that in his efforts to discredit the civil service, and in his zeal to make it appear that the spoils system is the better thing for this country, he has been arguing the evils of the spoils system as a reason why we should return to it. The various cases that he took up under the reign of Mr. Benedict in the Government Printing Office, as he must have known, and as every gentleman upon this floor knows, were removals that took place under the spoils system, and he is urging these special cases—some of them extraordinary in their character and deserving of the censure of all good men—I repeat, he is urging these extraordinary cases as a reason why we should return to the spoils system.

On the other hand, he has argued that the law as it now exists is not enforced; and, forsooth, because the officers whose duty it has been in the past have not strictly enforced the provisions, the letter, and spirit of the civil-service law, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS] would argue that that law ought to be repealed. While he does not say that, that is the gist of his argument, that we ought to return to the spoils system. If the logic of the gentleman be proper and correct, if it carry with it any force, then the same argument might be made against every criminal law that exists upon the Federal or State statute books in this country. Why, sir, I know of no law that is not violated almost every day, every week, and every month in the year.

We have statutes prohibiting the crime of murder, and yet men are murdered all over the country. We have statutes prohibiting all kinds of common-law as well as statutory crimes, and they are violated week in and week out. If, therefore, because the civil-service law has been violated by bad men, if because men have got into power who have evaded its provisions and have operated under the spoils system instead of under the spirit and letter of the civil-service law, is any reason why it should be repealed, then the same argument applies to every law upon the Federal or State statute books.

So, I say, that the argument of the gentleman, instead of being in favor of his theory, is an argument against his theory. The discharging of old soldiers that he has talked about, in order to make places for Democrats, the discharging of widows to make place for some political striker or rounder, were done under the spoils system, and he urges this as a reason why the present civil-service law should be repealed, or why it should be so modified, according to his theory, as to let Republicans into office instead of Democrats and other people.

I am no less amused by the argument of the gentleman from Indiana than I am astonished at the position of some gentlemen upon the Republican side of this Chamber. I have, sir, looked upon the crime of infanticide as one of the most heinous in all the penal code; and yet there are men upon this floor openly, avowedly, and urgently endeavoring to kill their own child—a child of the Republican party—the civil-service law. Men that helped to make it; men who in every convention since 1872, when they expressed an opinion upon the civil service, have declared in its favor; men who have upon the stump defended it since the passage of the act in 1883 are upon this floor attempting to destroy the very thing which they themselves have made.

The most remarkable statement that I have heard, and the most frank and candid made by almost any gentleman that has been fighting this law, was made by the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY]. I always like boldness. I have always believed that a man ought to be frank, open, and fair, and say just what he believes. The gentleman from North Carolina told us in plain and unequivocal terms that he was in favor of uprooting the civil-service law, root and branch. I want to read just what he said, because it struck me at the time as a very marvelous statement; and I have not changed my opinion. On the 10th day of December the gentleman from North Carolina said in his address:

> But let me call attention to another point. I say, Mr. Chairman, there is no way of maintaining a party organization except by giving your friends the offices. [Laughter and applause.] The late distinguished Judge Pearson, of my State, the father of my colleague, once administered this rebuke to Judge Armfield, one of the best representatives of legal thought in my State. Judge Armfield had selected a witness from the camp of the enemy and that witness had deceived him, and he asked for a new hearing on the ground that the witness had deceived and betrayed him. The court declined to grant a new hearing, and Judge Pearson said: "The man who goes to the camp of the enemy for a recruit and catches a traitor is not entitled to the respect or sympathy of this court." That was the opinion of Judge Pearson. Now, we have, I believe, nearly 100,000 public offices in this country in the possession of men who fought on the other side in this great war of opinion, and the proposition contended for by the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] reverses the ordinary course of warfare, whether it be a war of opinion or a war of arms, and undertakes to pension and honor the vanquished. Why, sir, four years hence, if we continue this course, we shall not have a party big enough to cast a shadow.

In the same speech he used this very significant language:

> The gentleman can rely much on party organization.

Referring to the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. ALLEN:

> I must rely upon the purifying process of reason addressed to the intellect and conscience. [Laughter.] Let me tell you that if this system of civil service continues I will not get 19,000 votes next year. Neither will the Republican party in my State present force enough to grease a gimlet to bore a hole to bury ourselves. [Laughter.]

In one breath the distinguished gentleman told us that he must appeal in his State to the purifying influence of reason addressed to the conscience of his constituents, and in the next breath he said unless we returned to the "spoils system" there would not be enough Republicans left in North Carolina to present force enough to grease a gimlet to bore a hole to bury the body. A marvelous statement!

I presume the gentleman from North Carolina understands that the only purifying process which appeals to the reason of the average Republican in North Carolina is the Government pie counter, because that is what he tells us. He must appeal to the reason of his constituents, and unless pie counters are established and opened up to them he will not have 19,000 votes, nor would there be enough left to cast a shadow. So the purifying process of reason that gets hold of the North Carolina Republicans is the Government pie counter, where they can all rush up and fill themselves at the expense of the taxpayers of this country! I want to say, gentlemen, if the statement of the gentleman from North Carolina be true, that there will not be enough of the Republican party left to cast a shadow unless the civil-service law is repealed, in God's name let us not repeal it, but make it stronger, because I think it would be one of the greatest blessings that could happen to the American people to see the Republican party get so thin that it would take two of it to cast a respectable shadow. [Laughter.]

I want to stop for a moment and think of it! The party of Abraham Lincoln, the party of Thaddeus Stevens and of Sumner, the party of Grant and Garfield, a representative of that party standing upon this floor and announcing to this House and to the country that unless the spoils system be established there would not be enough of it left to cast a shadow!

Why, sir, I have always believed that parties are built upon great fundamental principles of government. I have always believed that parties were the aggregation of intelligent men who cluster around great fundamental principles as a nucleus. I believe, sir, that when the Republican party was organized, with the immortal Lincoln at its head, and went into power, it was organized upon the great, broad fundamental principles of liberty.

Men did not vote for Abraham Lincoln because they expected to be let to the Government pie counter. These old men who rallied around the standard of early Republicanism rallied around the standard of human liberty; it was not a pie counter. And yet, after thirty years, when Abraham Lincoln has passed away, it remains for distinguished Republicans to tell the Congress of the United States and the country that the party has so far degenerated that it has no great principles that can hold the party together. Nothing left! Nothing left but the spoils of office. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that if there ever comes a time in the history of the party to which I belong when it has no principles around which the voters can cluster; if I can not go to the voters in my district and talk to them about great fundamental principles which will enlist their sympathies and to which their hearts shall be drawn; if I have got to resort to the pie-counter theory to get them enlisted, I will quit politics, so help me God, and I will never enter the field again—never!

Parties must exist upon principle. Parties must live because the party holds to some great fundamental principle that underlies the Government and that inures to the weal or the woe of the masses of the people. I feel a great deal of sympathy for these gentlemen who are in favor of the spoils system. I know from the talk of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY] that behind him are a lot of hungry Republicans—lank, lean, and emaciated. [Laughter.] I know they are goading him on. I know that they stand and look through the windows and with gnawing stomachs are pining to be let into the soup trough of the Government. [Laughter.] I know that. But I want to say, if his story be true, for God's sake let us strengthen the civil-service law, because he says he will not come back, and no other Republican either, and we do not want them.

I want to say this, that the administration of the civil service of this country is not in the interest of the Republican party, of the Democratic party, of the Populist party, or of any one political party. The Departments of the Government are supposed to be administered in the interest of the whole people, for it often happens that the party that gets into power gets in by a minority vote. There are three or four or five distinct political organizations in this country, so that the party in power does not necessarily represent the majority of the American people; and for gentlemen to assume that the management of the entire civil service of the country belongs to one party is an erroneous idea. It belongs to the whole people, and I would say to gentlemen who are so zealous in their advocacy of the spoils system, if you believe that the great masses of the American people are not in favor of civil-service reform, you were never more mistaken in any proposition in your lives. You may go into every State of this Union, you may go into every county in every State, and I have not a doubt but you will find that the great masses of the rank and file of the intelligent people, from one end of the country to the other, are in favor of the principle of civil-service reform. I doubt very much if you could get one-third of the vote of the rank and file of the American people in favor of the repeal of the civil-service law. The masses of our people are not office seekers. Take the great agricultural portion of this country, the bone and sinew of this country, the foundation of our prosperity, the men who have made and who will continue to make the country great and glorious, the agricultural people of this country, and I say to you, sir, that the agriculturists of this country are not office seekers. They are not expecting to break into the Government pie counter at Washington or anywhere else. But while they are not office seekers, they are interested in having the best possible civil service that can be given them by the Government. They are interested in having men in all the Departments of the Government who can so manage them as to save to the taxpayers of this country large sums of money; and that is what is being done under the present civil-service system, imperfect though it may be. On the other hand, the rank and file of the business men of the nation are not office seekers; they are not standing behind their Congressmen nagging them for Federal appointments. They do not want such appointments. Then who is it that is agitating this question? Why, sir, it is the political rounder, it is the ward politician, it is the precinct bummer that is behind these Congressmen urging them to get back to the spoils system.

I was a little surprised at the attempt of the gentleman from Indiana to criticise "the better element" of the country. I know that sometimes we hear men speaking about the "better element" of the country when they mean the wealthy aristocracy of the country. If the gentleman alluded to that class, I agree with him; but the inference to be drawn from his remarks was that the "better element" of the country—that is, the men who are not office seekers and who are in favor of civil-service reform—are to be looked upon with suspicion. Let me say that the men who are in favor of civil-service reform do constitute the very best element of this country. They are not, it is true, the ward heelers; they are not the fellows who slip around and do the dirty political work just before election, but they are the men who bear its burdens in the way of taxation. They are the men who seek the highest welfare of their country.

But I have said that nearly all parties have in their platforms declared in favor of civil-service reform. As far back as 1872, the Republican party made its first declaration on this subject in the following language:

Any system of the civil service under which the subordinate positions of the Government are considered rewards for mere party zeal is fatally demoralizing, and we therefore favor a reform of the system by laws which shall abolish the evils of patronage and make honesty, efficiency, and fidelity the essential qualifications for public positions without practically creating a life tenure of office.

Again, at Chicago, in 1880, the Republican platform says:

The Republican party, adhering to the principles affirmed by its last national convention of respect for the constitutional rules governing appointments to office, adopts the declaration of President Hayes that the reform of the civil service should be thorough, radical, and complete. To this end it demands the cooperation of the legislative with the executive department of the Government, and that Congress shall so legislate that fitness, ascertained by proper tests, shall admit to the public service.

Again, at Chicago, in 1884, their platform reads:

Reform of the civil service, auspiciously begun under Republican administration, should be completed by the further extension of the reform system, already established by law, to all the grades of the service to which it is applicable. The spirit and purpose of the reform should be observed in all Executive appointments; and all laws at variance with the objects of existing reform legislation should be repealed, to the end that the dangers to free institutions which lurk in the power of official patronage may be wisely and effectively avoided.

Again, in 1888, they say:

The men who abandoned the Republican party in 1884 and continue to adhere to the Democratic party have deserted not only the cause of honest government, of sound finance, of freedom, of purity of the ballot, but especially have deserted the cause of reform in the civil service. We will not fail to keep our pledges because they have broken theirs or because their candidate has broken his. We therefore repeat our declaration of 1884, to wit: "The reform of the civil service auspiciously begun under the Republican administration should be completed by the further extension of the reform system already established by law to all the grades of the service to which it is applicable. The spirit and the purpose of the reform should be observed in all Executive appointments, and all laws at variance with the object of existing reform legislation should be repealed, to the end that the dangers to free institutions which lurk in the power of official patronage may be wisely and effectually avoided."

Again, in 1892, they say:

We commend the spirit and evidence of reform in the civil service and the wise and consistent enforcement by the Republican party of the laws regulating the same.

And again, at St. Louis, June 21, 1896, the last declaration made on this question, you say:

The civil-service law was placed on the statute book by the Republican party, which has always sustained it, and we renew our repeated declarations that it shall be thoroughly and honestly enforced and extended wherever practicable.

Did these solemn declarations mean anything, or were they simply as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal, uttered only to be broken?

Let me ask the gentlemen who are so bitterly denouncing civil-service reform on this floor, did you not indorse each and all of these platforms? Is it not true that some of you at these conventions voted for their adoption? Were you in earnest when you made these platform declarations, or were you only bidding for votes?

I believe, sir, that a platform is a solemn pledge made to the people, and is as binding upon the party and the men who make it as any pledge that can be made. A man can not constantly violate his word and hold the respect of his neighbors, and it is just as true that a party can not persistently disregard its platform pledges and long hold the confidence and respect of the people. The observation by some politician, that "platforms are made to run on," is in disrepute with the masses and is becoming more disreputable every year.

Will you keep this one pledge or shall it be like all others which you have made, trampled under foot? Is there no promise made by the Republican party too sacred to be broken?

How much longer do you expect the people of this country to trust your party if you continue to break your platform pledges as you have in the past?

Do you answer, you have not broken them? Let us see.

Turning to the Republican platform adopted at Chicago June 21, 1888, we find the following declaration:

The Republican party is in favor of the use of both gold and silver as money, and condemns the policy of the Democratic Administration in its efforts to demonetize silver.

By this declaration the Republican party pledged itself to the cause of silver, and upon that false promise went before the people. The people believed it, and you succeeded in electing a President. Did you keep that promise? No; from then till now your party has been the enemy of silver, and no obstacle could be thrown in its way that you have not put there; no argument could be invented to decry it that has not been resorted to, and to-day you openly denounce that which you then professed to believe. In 1893 you joined forces with Cleveland to accomplish that which you denounced in 1888.

Again, in your platform adopted at St. Louis last year, you said:

The Republican party is unreservedly for sound money. It caused the enactment of a law providing for the resumption of specie payments in 1879; since then every dollar has been as good as gold.

We are unalterably opposed to every measure calculated to debase our currency or impair the credit of our country. We are therefore opposed to the free coinage of silver, except by international agreement with the leading commercial nations of the world, which we pledge ourselves to promote, and until such an agreement can be obtained the existing gold standard must be preserved.

How has this promise been kept?

You appropriated $100,000 to send a commission on a junketing trip abroad, and while they were there ostensibly to secure the pledge of your platform, the Sound Money League Republican, the entire Republican press, and almost every Republican orator were engaged in vociferous demands for the single gold standard, and by every utterance demonstrated that the pledge of the platform was a hollow sham.

But a few days ago Mr. Gage, the present Secretary of the Treasury, while before the Senate committee, and being interrogated by Senator STEWART as to the objects and purposes of his proposed bill, declared that its first object was—

To commit the country more thoroughly to the gold standard, remove, so far as possible, doubts and fears on that point, and thus strengthen the credit of the United States both at home and abroad.

By these utterances the sincerity of the Republican party even as to international bimetallism must be judged by the people, "for out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh."

Turn with me now to the letter of acceptance written by the present incumbent at the White House and follow me while I read what he says:

This has been the unbroken policy of the Republican party since 1878. It has inaugurated no new policy. It will keep in circulation and as good as gold all of the silver and paper money which are now included in the currency of the country. It will maintain their parity. It will preserve their equality in the future as it has always done in the past.

Language could not be more explicit. Here is a pledge before election which solemnly declares that the Republican party will keep in circulation all of the silver and paper money which are now included in the currency of the country. No pledge could be more sacred. It came from one seeking the highest place within the gift of the American people. The people had a right to rely upon it coming as it did from one so distinguished. But how has that pledge been kept?

The election came, and the Republican party triumphed, and no sooner had our present Chief Magistrate been inducted into office than in his inaugural address he said:

The several forms of our paper money offer, in my judgment, a constant embarrassment to the Government and a safe balance in the Treasury.

He then proceeds to suggest the appointment of a commission to revise the currency laws, and from then till now it seems to have been the studied policy of the Administration and of the Republican party to devise some plan to retire the greenbacks, which was a part of the currency pledged by the letter of acceptance of Mr. McKinley to be kept in circulation, and that scheme has culminated by the introduction of a bill in this House, devised by the present Secretary of the Treasury, which has for its chief object the retirement of the greenbacks—the accomplishment of the very thing which the President's letter of acceptance promised should not be done.

Before election the Republican party is Dr. Jekyll, and after election Mr. Hyde.

Now let me cite one more instance of broken faith and I will leave this branch of the subject. In your platform of 1896 you say:

From the hour of achieving their own independence the people of the United States have regarded with sympathy the struggles of other American people to free themselves from European domination.

We watch with deep and abiding interest the heroic battle of the Cuban patriots against cruelty and oppression, and our best hopes go out for the full success of their determined contest for liberty.

The Government of Spain having lost control of Cuba, and being unable to protect the property and lives of resident American citizens, or to comply with its treaty obligations, we believe that the Government of the United States should actively use its influence and good offices to restore peace and give independence to the island.

Have you kept that promise?

Nearly a year has passed since the Republican party came into power and that year has been one of blood and carnage on the Island of Cuba. Men have been murdered in Spanish prisons; women and helpless children have been huddled together in small houses to starve and die of hunger and disease, while their hands have been held out to us for pity, sympathy, and aid, and your party has been as deaf to their cries as an adder.

These people have an island as rich as the valley of the Nile; it is the garden of the sea; and yet, because of Spanish cruelty, we are asked to send them aid to keep starvation from claiming them as its victims. Sir, in one short hour we could, by resolution of this House, take the tyrant's hand from their throats and set them at work in their fertile fields and render aid from this country unnecessary. By your platform you pledged yourselves to do it. Why do you not keep that pledge?

I am in favor of sending aid to these struggling patriots in the way of food and clothes, but the best aid we can send them is a resolution of this House recognizing their independence. But the capitalists say that will bring on a war with Spain and impair securities. Do it and there will be no war with Spain. In any event human life and liberty are of more value than all the stocks and bonds on earth. Keep the pledge you made and there will be no trouble with Spain; but even if there should be, what of it? I am in favor of doing right and let the future take care of itself. I am in favor of preserving the honor and glory of the American Republic regardless of the result. If, by protecting suffering humanity and lending our influence to liberate a suffering people from the hand of tyranny, war should be forced upon us, at the first roll of the drum and the first sound of "Yankee Doodle" a million bayonets would shimmer and shine under a Northern sun, and at the first strain of "Dixie" a million sabers would leap from their scabbards in the South, and as one unconquerable army under the Stars and Stripes would take care of the issue.

So I come to you in the name of a betrayed people and ask that this one promise of civil-service reform be sacredly kept. That you keep it not merely because you have promised to do so, but because it is, in my judgment, in the interests of the people—because the merit system is the only way to obtain the best possible service.

The argument that the appointees should be in sympathy with the Administration, and that the application of true civil-service reform hampers or cripples the Administration, is the merest sophistry. It is known to all that the appointments which are political in their nature are not included in the classified service, so that this claim falls to the ground of its own weakness.

At present there are about 80,000 persons included in this service, made up of clerks in the mail service and in the various bureaus of the Government, who can have no possible hand in the administration of the Government so far as shaping its policies are concerned. These men are to transact the business of the people and not the business of a political party. I think I may say without fear of successful contradiction that what is good business policy for an individual is good policy for a government. Does the merchant in the selection of his clerks and salesmen choose them because of their political tendencies, or does he make honesty and fitness the test of employment? How long would any business man last were he to adopt the methods demanded by the opponents of civil-service reform for the Government?

These men in their private concerns are not guided by the rules which they seek to foist upon the people of this country. Why, then, do they demand the repeal or modification of the civil service reform legislation? Is it for the reason assigned by the gentleman from North Carolina, that unless that is done they will not be returned to Congress? I hope this House will be guided by higher and purer motives than the mere retention of power. If good government and a merit test for admission to the civil service will destroy the Republican party, then its demise will be hailed with delight by all people who believe in good government.

But it is contended that civil-service reform is a sham; that in its operation the spirit of the law is ignored or evaded. Is that a reason why the law should be repealed? If so, then every law in the criminal code should be wiped out, for I know of none that is not violated or evaded. If those in power whose duty it is to administer the law fail or refuse to obey it in its every letter and spirit, then the remedy is to elect men who will obey it.

Another argument against civil-service reform is that it gives the places to college graduates and takes away the opportunities of farmers' sons and laborers to fill these positions. If this were true, then it would be a strong reason why the law should be repealed, but, like many other of their contentions, there is nothing in it. An examination will show that of all the employees in the classified service of the Government about 75 per cent come from the common schools, and instead of its building up a class it prevents just that thing, while the spoils system shuts out the boys of poor men from the public service.

In explanation of how this is done, I can do no better than to quote from an address delivered at Cincinnati by Carl Schurz, December 16, 1897, substantially as follows:

Here is the ordinary course of things under the spoils system: John Smith, a carpenter or a bricklayer, who sustains himself and his family by industrious work and does his duty as a good citizen by voting according to his honest convictions, has a bright boy. That boy has received a good common-school education and sharpened his intellect and increased his knowledge by personal effort in various ways. He is a young man, too, of correct habits and excellent character. He wishes to enter the Government service as a clerk. How must he go about it? The spoils system prevails. He finds that Government clerks are appointed only upon the recommendation of somebody.

He can easily obtain testimonials from a number of highly respectable persons who know him, but he is told that he will need the recommendation of some politician of influence, best of all that of the member of Congress—that, in fact, without the good will of the member of Congress nothing can be accomplished. He approaches the member from his district and exhibits the testimonials as to his ability and to his character. "Oh, that is all well enough," says the honorable gentleman, "but to what party do you belong?"

If poor young Smith happens not to belong to the party of the honorable member, there is, of course, the end of it at once. But let us suppose he does. Then the great man continues the examination. "What claims have you?" he asks. "Claims?" replies young Smith, "Why, here are my testimonials as to my ability and character, and I am willing to undergo any test to prove that I can well perform a clerk's duty." "Oh, hang all that," exclaims the member of Congress impatiently, "what claims have you politically, you or your father? I have never heard of either of you during the campaign."

The young man is obliged to confess that they were too poor to contribute money to the campaign fund, and too busy with their daily work to do more in the election than cast their votes and occasionally discuss politics with their neighbors. The examination is finished. "Well," says the great man languidly, "you may leave your papers here and I will consider them in time." This ends the interview.

When young Smith passes out of the great man's door, two other persons pass in—Mr. Brown, a wealthy manufacturer with hundreds of operatives in his employ, and his nephew, young Mr. ——, a youth of questionable past and uncertain character. Mr. Brown is tired of taking care of this unthrifty poor relative, and finds it most convenient to unload him upon the Government. The member of Congress receives the two most cordially, and asks what he can do for them. "I want a Government clerkship for my nephew," says Mr. Brown. "You know what I did for you in the campaign—my contribution to the war chest and the votes of all my people." "Of course," interrupts the member of Congress; "I know what recognition I and the party owe you. Your nephew seems to be a splendid fellow, too." "Well," says Mr. Brown, "as to that, I don't think he knows much, but he may learn." "Never mind that," says the member of Congress, smilingly; "that will be all right. Send him on to Washington." In Washington he takes young Mr. —— to one of the Departments. "I must have a clerkship for this young man," he says to the Secretary, "and a good one, too. He is the nephew of one of my most powerful constituents, whom I am bound to oblige." The Secretary sees the necessity.

There are pass examinations held in the Department—that is to say, examinations conducted by the appointing power itself—to which only candidates with influential recommendations behind them are admitted, not seriously to compete with each other, but at best to show that they are not absolute dunces or idiots. They are a mere hollow form, as influence rules it all. The member of Congress asks that the thing be made easy to young Mr. ——. He receives a knowing wink in reply, and the thing is made easy. Mr. —— is asked to add up 2 and 2 and to give the name of the capital city of the Union—questions which were once actually asked within my knowledge. Mr. —— issues triumphantly from the ordeal.

But there is no vacancy. What of it? A vacancy must be made. It is found that some clerk in the Department has "lost his influence;" that is, the member of Congress on whose recommendation he was appointed has died. He is a very meritorious and valuable clerk, but having lost his influence, and no new influence turning up, he is removed to make room for young ——. Young —— shows a fondness for strong drink and neglect of duty, and he is threatened with dismissal. He complains to his member of Congress, who rushes at once to the Secretary, exclaiming:

"If you dismiss young —— it will offend Mr. Brown, my most powerful constituent, and my district may be lost. I must insist that Mr. —— be kept." Young —— is kept in the service, and his duties are made light, so that there is not much to neglect. In the meantime young Smith is still waiting for a favorable consideration of his testimonials, which of course never comes.

But are the civil-service rules a means of saving to the Government?

I have here the testimony of Mr. Oyster, before the Senate committee, throwing strong light on this point, and which I will read:

Mr. OYSTER. They were made without any regard whatever to the politics, but I might state here, because it is an absolute fact, that more than three-fourths of those people discharged were Democrats, and the record shows, I say, 54 per cent improvement. A portion of that improvement is estimated, but 45 per cent of the improvement is on work actually done. In other words, the 33 compositors who came through the civil service earned in the one year, the year 1896, $10,164 more than the 33 whom Mr. Benedict discharged would have earned at the same rate. Forty-five per cent of it, I say, was on actual work done.

They actually performed 45 per cent more work, and the quality of their work was a great improvement over the quality of the other. The quality of the work of those who were dismissed was just about as bad as the quantity, and on a low estimate I judge it would cost $50 a year more to have read the proof of each one of those men dismissed than it would to read such proofs as are set by civil-service printers, whom we get through the commission.

I do not want to be put in the position here of saying that there is a difference of 54 per cent between the civil-service people and the whole number of people in the office. This, of course, I can see is taking the very best of the civil-service people—those who were sifted through our sieve and our examination in the office, the practical part of it—and putting them against the very poorest who came in under the old system; but I have no doubt whatever that there is a very large percentage of improvement, even by putting them against the average employees of the office who came in under the old system.

In my division I put the same 33 against all the regular specification hands who had been sifted through Mr. Benedict's merit system, after the poor printers had been discharged from the office, thus getting the very best who came in under the old system. Still the improvement in favor of those who came in through the civil service is probably 6 or 8 or 10 per cent. This is why I say that I think the application of the civil-service rules to the office is beneficial to the Government, and that it would be very detrimental to the public interests for the civil-service rules to be removed from the office.

I have a statement here which shows that from 1861 to 1897, since the establishment of the Government Printing Office, there have been about $84,500,000 expended for public printing—that is, through the Public Printer alone—and about 66 per cent of the total amount of money is paid out direct to labor; that is, paid out to employees of the office for labor—from 65 to 68 per cent. I put it at 66 per cent, and that would be $55,770,000 for wages.

The CHAIRMAN. It will take you some time to complete your statement.

Mr. OYSTER. This particular part of it I can conclude very shortly. I can finish in a minute. I put at 10 per cent only what I consider loss to the Government, although I am satisfied that the loss to the Government is very much greater than that by not conducting the office on a business basis, but through political influence and as a political machine. Ten per cent of that would be $5,577,000. The amount left then to have been expended for material would have been $28,730,000, and up to very recent years—up to the time when Mr. Benedict came in the first time—they paid the full market rate for material in the office; that is, they did not get the discount which came to private parties when buying material. Although the Government bought ten or twenty times as much as a private office, they got no discount, while the private office would get 10, 15, 20, and as high as 30 per cent discount.

I calculated 10 per cent of loss to the Government on material by not having proper business methods, and putting the two together there would be $8,450,000 which the Government has sunk by conducting that office, not on business principles, but as a political machine.

Without taking time to go into detail, I may say that the same is true in nearly if not all the Departments of the Government. Not only have the people had a better service, but many millions of dollars have been saved to the taxpayers by the enactment of the present civil-service law, imperfect as it is and notwithstanding its many violations. Civil-service reform has been indorsed by almost every statesman who has talked upon the subject for the last two decades, and the evils of the spoils system have been seen and denounced since the formation of the Government.

What we want now is not to "return like the dog to his vomit, or the sow to her wallowing in the mire," because we have found the law imperfect and its provisions evaded, but so amend it as to obviate its difficulties and prevent its violation.

There is one feature of it to which I am strongly opposed, and that is its allowing a life tenure in office, and this is the one feature which has been productive of the opposition to the law among the masses. I have said, and I repeat it, that the masses are in favor of civil-service reform, but they are, in my opinion, opposed especially to this one feature of the law. I would favor an enactment fixing a limit to the service, say eight years, and that one-fourth of that number should retire every two years, thus leaving constantly in the service three-fourths of trained public servants, and at the same time giving ample opportunity for all who desire to stand an even chance of entering the public service.

Another fault which can be easily remedied is the provision which makes possible a rule under which, when a vacancy occurs in any of the Departments, the names of three are sent to the head of the Department and he is allowed from the three who have passed the examination to select one. This, in my judgment, is the most prolific source of violation of the spirit of the law. If the head of the Department happens to be a Republican, among the three names sent in one at least is likely to be also a Republican, and it is quite easy to select him and pass by the other two, and so fill up the Department with partisans in contravention of law; but if the law is so amended as to require the appointment of the one of the three having the highest grade in his examination, then no political preference could enter into it and each one would stand or fall on his merits. It is needless to argue that abuses of the law can not be remedied, for they can; and that they ought, no one will scarce deny. What the people want is a fair, just, and true public service based upon character and fitness for the position.

The public service is for the whole people, and not for the elevation of any political party to power, and the best possible service will be attained by entirely divorcing the service from the realm of party politics.

But, sir, if the law is to be trampled under foot and is only intended as a sham, repeal it—give the people another dose of the spoils system in the open field, and not under cover, and I promise you when we elect Bryan in 1900 no one will take more pleasure than I in seeing the last Republican walk the plank never to return until Gabriel shall stand with one foot on dry land and the other on the sea and swear by Him that liveth forever and ever that time shall be no more.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MOODY. I move that the committee now rise.

Mr. DOCKERY. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion. I should like to be recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MOODY. Very well; I withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] for five minutes.

Mr. DOCKERY. I yield my time to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not take the floor now for the purpose of making a speech on the merits of the civil-service law. I do not know that I shall at any time undertake to contribute anything by way of relieving our friends on the other side from the difficulties which seem to surround them. I take the floor just at this time to put into the RECORD some figures in reference to the Government Printing Office; and I do so because the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS] criticised the administration of the late Public Printer, Mr. Benedict, in respect to appointments in that office.

I have here what I think is an official statement, or a copy of an official statement, of the condition of that office when it passed under the civil-service law. In August, 1895, the civil-service law was spread over the Government Printing Office. I have had some experience, as many of you know, in connection with that bureau of our Government. I did not favor the extension of the civil-service law over it. I did not think it practical. I did not think the law could be equitably enforced there, and for that reason I was opposed to its extension. But it was done, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS] has taken occasion to criticise the Public Printer who was in office when the law was extended over that bureau. In vindication, therefore, of that officer I desire to submit these figures:

In August, 1895, when the civil-service law was extended to that branch of the Government, there were 2,710 employees in that office. Eight hundred and forty-two of that number were appointed by Mr. Benedict, the Democratic Public Printer—only 31 per cent of the number of employees then in that office. One thousand two hundred and three of the 2,710 employees were appointed by Mr. Palmer, the Republican Public Printer. That leaves 665 who had held office in the Government Printing Office prior to the terms of these gentlemen, many of whom have been there from fifteen to twenty years.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me unjust to charge that Mr. Benedict debauched the public service, or that it was any benefit to the Democratic party especially, or to the appointees of a Democratic Public Printer to extend the civil-service law over the Government Printing Office at that time. More appointees of a Republican Public Printer got the advantage of that extension than appointees of the Democratic Public Printer. I repeat, that 31 per cent of the employees at that time had received their appointment from the hands of a Democratic Public Printer, while 44 per cent had received their appointments from the hands of a Republican Public Printer. I simply wanted to put these facts in evidence. [Applause.]

Mr. MOODY. I now renew my motion that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOPKINS reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. RAWLINS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1883) for the appointment of a commission to make allotments of land in severalty to Indians upon the Uintah Indian Reservation, in Utah, and to obtain the cession to the United States of all lands within said reservation not so allotted, reported it without amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2374) for the relief of Ezekiel Downey, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2640) to authorize two additional regiments of artillery, reported it with an amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. FRYE. At the request of the Secretary of the Treasury, I introduce two bills. I ask that they be read twice and referred, with the accompanying papers, to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (S. 3032) increasing the pay of the chief engineers of the Revenue-Cutter Service, appointing naval constructor, and granting pensions to seamen of said service was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (S. 3033) for the construction of new vessels for the Revenue-Cutter Service was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. McMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 3034) to amend the charter of the Eckington and Soldiers' Home Railway Company, of the District of Columbia, the Maryland and Washington Railway Company, and the Belt Railway Company, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3035) to amend an act of Congress approved March 2, 1893, entitled "An act to provide a permanent system of highways in that part of the District of Columbia lying outside of cities," and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PLATT of New York introduced a bill (S. 3036) for the relief of George W. Quintard; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3037) for the relief of Thomas Stack; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3038) increasing the pension of John Taylor; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PETTIGREW introduced a bill (S. 3039) to reimburse the State of South Dakota the expenses incurred by that State in repelling a threatened invasion and raid by the Sioux in 1890 and 1891; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. KENNEY introduced a bill (S. 3040) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue to captains or masters of steam pilot vessels certain life-saving apparatus; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3041) authorizing the survey of St. Jones River, Delaware; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BAKER introduced a bill (S. 3042) for the relief of Gustave A. Hesselberger; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. QUAY introduced a bill (S. 3043) to remove the charge of desertion from the record of W. B. Stone; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. THURSTON introduced a bill (S. 3044) granting a pension to Charles A. Perkins, of Omaha, Nebr.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3045) granting a pension to Catherine Mulcahy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3046) to authorize the location of a branch home for volunteer disabled soldiers and sailors at or near the city of Beatrice, Nebr., and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. McBRIDE introduced a bill (S. 3047) for the relief of Wilbur F. Cogswell; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3048) to establish an assay office at the city of Portland, in the State of Oregon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3049) relating to appeals in civil and criminal cases from the district court of the United States for the District of Alaska; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WHITE introduced a bill (S. 3050) to amend section 3221 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, concerning the abatement or refunding of tax on distilled spirits destroyed by casualties; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

AMENDMENT TO INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PETTIGREW submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ADDITIONAL CLERK OF COMMITTEE ON COAST DEFENSES.

Mr. McBRIDE submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Coast Defenses be, and it hereby is, authorized to employ an additional clerk, until the expiration of the present session, at the rate of $1,440 per annum, whose compensation shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

ASSEMBLY OF REPRESENTATIVE INDIANS AT OMAHA, NEBR.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask unanimous consent to call up for consideration the bill (S. 2507) to provide for the holding of a congress of the Indian tribes of the United States at the city of Omaha, in the State of Nebraska, in the year A. D. 1898, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments.

The first amendment was, in line 8, after the word "tribes," to insert:

As a part of the Trans-Mississippi and International Exposition to be held at the city of Omaha, in the State of Nebraska, pursuant to an act of Congress entitled "An act to authorize and encourage the holding of a Trans-Mississippi and International Exposition at the city of Omaha, in the State of Nebraska, in the year 1898," approved June 10, 1896.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. My attention has been called to the provisions of the bill. Whilst I hesitate to interfere with the report of the committee, I think there are several amendments that ought to be made. I have shown them to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] who has the bill in charge. I think perhaps he will not object to them. Therefore I ask at this stage of the proceeding that I may send all of the amendments to the desk and that they be adopted seriatim.

Mr. ALLEN. I have conferred with the Senator from Iowa respecting the proposed amendments, and I shall acquiesce in them. There are certain other committee amendments, however, which have not been read yet.

Mr. ALLISON. All the other amendments suggested by the committee following the one just adopted I shall propose to strike out in the course of the proceeding upon the amendments I have offered.

Mr. ALLEN. In that case, let the amendments offered by the Senator from Iowa be acted upon and let the remaining committee amendments be rejected. That will cover the whole matter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will take the course which the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from Iowa agree upon. The first amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 4, after the word "required," strike out "through the instrumentality of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs;" in line 5, after the word "be," strike out "held," and insert "assembled;" in line 6, after the word "Nebraska," insert "at such time and for such period as he may designate;" and in line 8, after the words "eighteen hundred and ninety-eight," strike out "a congress of the" and insert "representatives of different;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to cause to be assembled at the city of Omaha, in the State of Nebraska, at such time and for such period as he may designate between the 1st days of June and November, A. D. 1898, representatives of different Indian tribes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The next amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 15, strike out the words "at which shall be illustrated" and insert "for the purpose of illustrating."

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The next amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Strike out the period after the word "States," in line 17, and the following words: "Said congress shall be composed of representative members of every tribe, showing the tribal customs and habits, ancient and modern," and insert in lieu the word "and;" in line 22, after the word "which," strike out "congress are hereby left to" and insert "shall be in;" and in line 25, before the word "thousand," strike out "one hundred" and insert "forty-five;" so as to read:

And the progress made by education, and such other matters and things as will fully illustrate Indian advancement in civilization, the details of which shall be in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior. And for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this act the sum of $45,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The last amendment suggested by the Senator from Iowa will be read.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the bill, strike out, after the word "appropriated," the period and insert a comma and the following:

Or so much thereof as may be necessary; but the Secretary of the Interior is hereby prohibited from making, or causing to be made, any expenditure or creating any liability on behalf of the United States in excess of the sum hereby appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN. Now let the bill be read as amended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska suggests the full reading of the bill as amended. It will be read, as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to cause to be assembled at the city of Omaha, in the State of Nebraska, at such time and for such period as he may designate, between the 1st days of June and November, A. D. 1898, representatives of different Indian tribes, as a part of the Trans-Mississippi and International Exposition to be held at the city of Omaha, in the State of Nebraska, pursuant to an act of Congress entitled "An act to authorize and encourage the holding of a Trans-Mississippi and International Exposition at the city of Omaha, in the State of Nebraska, in the year 1898," approved June 10, 1896, for the purpose of illustrating the past and present conditions of the various Indian tribes of the United States, and the progress made by education, and such other matters and things as will fully illustrate Indian advancement in civilization, the details of which shall be in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior. And for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this act the sum of $45,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, or so much thereof as may be necessary; but the Secretary of the Interior is hereby prohibited from making, or causing to be made, any expenditure or creating any liability on behalf of the United States in excess of the sum hereby appropriated.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to strike out the words "or so much thereof as may be necessary," after the word "appropriated," in line 25. It is a repetition.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for the assembling of representatives of different Indian tribes of the United States at the city of Omaha, in the State of Nebraska, in the year 1898, and for other purposes."

PUBLIC BUILDING AT FERGUS FALLS, MINN.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2048) for the erection of a public building at Fergus Falls, Minn.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire, by gift, purchase, or condemnation, or otherwise, a site for, and cause to be erected thereon, a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States courts, post-office, and other Government offices at the city of Fergus Falls, in the State of Minnesota. The site and building thereon, with its appurtenances, when completed upon plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall not exceed in the aggregate the sum of $175,000. That no money appropriated for the purpose aforesaid shall be available until a valid title to the site for said building shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Minnesota shall have ceded to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of the State and the service of civil process therein. That the sum of $175,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be used and expended for the purposes of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

QUITCLAIM OF LOT IN CITY OF WASHINGTON.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There being no further morning business, the Calender under Rule VIII is in order.

The bill (S. 1081) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to quitclaim and release unto Francis Hall and Juriah Hall and their heirs and assigns all the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to the east 20 feet front by the full depth of 100 feet of lot 2, in square 493, in the city of Washington, D. C., as laid down on the original plan or plat of said city, was announced as first in order on the Calendar; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the further consideration of the Calendar may be for unobjected cases. The Senate is thin, and no contested cases ought to come up to-day without notice. Therefore I ask unanimous consent that this course may be pursued.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that only unobjected bills be taken up while the Calendar is under consideration during the morning hour to-day. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none, and that will be the order. If objection be made to a bill, it will lie over.

AMERICAN NATIONAL RED CROSS.

The bill (S. 1913) to protect the insignia and the name of the Red Cross was read; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. HALE. It struck me as the bill was read that it is pretty sharp in its provisions about the imitation of certain devices. I do not know whether the committee having it in charge or the Senator reporting it has examined into that feature very carefully. There are, of course, a great many associations that have flags, banners, and devices of their own, and I do not think we ought to legislate very extremely on the subject, as it might cause great trouble if anyone should be inclined to make the bill mischievous by overenforcing it. I will ask the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] who reported the bill if that point has been carefully considered?

Mr. GRAY. I reported the bill after a very careful consideration of the subject and of the statements made by those who have in charge the great and beneficent charity whose operations are world wide under the name of the Red Cross Society. We all know what its field of operations is, and what its beneficence has been for some years.

A number of years ago application was made by Miss Barton, the very noble woman who is largely interested in the work, for some protection against the counterfeiting or improper use of the insignia of the society. The red cross worn upon the arm has become the common international sign of this society, whether on the battlefield, or in hospital, or in plague-stricken city. That sign is almost as sacred and as much reverenced as those of the beneficent religious orders that do so much good to humanity in times of distress.

Very naturally, it was sought to protect from improper use the insignia of this noble society. The first bill which was introduced was referred to a committee of which I was then a member, the Committee on Patents. It was a very sweeping measure indeed, and was open to the objection and the criticism the Senator from Maine has just made. I informed these very good people that I could not sanction such a bill; that I did not think we had any right to pass it. After a year or two we together formulated the bill which is now before the Senate, and which I believe (I may be wrong) has had eliminated from it all those objectionable features. I think the first bill that was introduced would prevent a manufacturing concern from using a red cross on their wares.

Mr. HALE. That was what I had in mind when I called the Senator's attention to the matter.

Mr. GRAY. That bill actually did prevent that, I think.

Mr. HALE. I remember distinctly that there were very grave objections to the first bill.

Mr. GRAY. There certainly were.

Mr. HALE. I did not know whether this measure had been scrutinized and those offensive features stricken out.

Mr. GRAY. It has been done so far as I know. I would be very glad, if there is any criticism on that line against this bill, to have an amendment adopted to meet it. I have not read this bill for some time; but I think the Senator will find that it is very carefully guarded. He will observe that the only persons who are forbidden "to wear and display the sign of the red cross above described, or any colorable imitation of said insignia, without permission from the American National Red Cross," are those who do so "for the purpose of collecting, soliciting, or receiving money or material, or who shall, by the use of said symbol or name of the American National Red Cross, do, or attempt to do, similar work to the American National Red Cross without permission from said organization."

Such persons shall be deemed guilty of misdemeanor. The only persons, then, to whom the bill, if it shall become a law, can possibly apply are those persons or associations who shall attempt to collect money under the name of the Red Cross and under the insignia of the Red Cross for doing the same sort of work. Inasmuch as the society is an international one and has been recognized by the Congress of the United States and by the diplomatic agencies of the United States as one that deserves the aid and recognition of the national authority, I believe that we ought to help these good people by a bill so guarded as I think the pending measure is.

Mr. HALE. I think the Senator from Delaware is correct about it. The only doubt I would have is in regard to the first part of the bill. It undoubtedly limits and prohibits the use of symbols to be worn by any person for the purpose of collecting, soliciting, or receiving money or material for similar work. I think it is very clear that that ought to be prohibited. How much force is there in what follows?

> Or who shall, by the use of said symbol or name of the American National Red Cross, do, or attempt to do, similar work to the American National Red Cross without permission from said organization.

I do not know how much further that would go than the prohibition to collect money. Possibly under this clause the bill might go further, and it might go too far.

Mr. GRAY. I see the criticism the Senator makes, and I appreciate its force. But let him consider for a moment the second clause, "or who shall, by the use of said symbol or name of the American National Red Cross, do, or attempt to do, similar work to the American National Red Cross without permission of said organization." "Or who shall, by the use of said symbol, attempt to do it"—I think that would guard it.

Mr. HALE. I think it does guard it. It simply prohibits the use of the symbol.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to inquire of the Senator whether this is a corporation; and if so, where it was incorporated?

Mr. GRAY. I do not think it has been incorporated.

Mr. TELLER. Then I should like to ask the Senator from Delaware what right we have to be interfering in questions of that character?

Mr. GRAY. I think if the Senator from Colorado will look at the preamble, it will answer his inquiry.

Mr. HALE. What is the force of the words in parentheses, lines 8, 9, and 10, "a duly authorized and recognized body incorporated under the laws for the District of Columbia"?

Mr. GRAY. I suppose those words are designed to show that it is an incorporated company.

Mr. HALE. Yes, I thought so. The parenthesis seems to be for the purpose of recognizing that this is an incorporated company.

Mr. BACON. I submit, Mr. President, that the colloquy between the Senators is such that we can not hear it. They are bunched together in a group and doubtless hear each other, but the rest of us can not hear what is going on.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] asked me a question.

Mr. BACON. I heard the question of the Senator from Colorado, but I did not hear the reply of the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. GRAY. My reply was that I did not then know; but I find in the preamble that it is recited——

Mr. BACON. Now, the Senator from Delaware can not be heard on the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. GRAY. It seems to be very hard for me to succeed in pleasing the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator tell us briefly what the bill means?

Mr. GRAY. I think the preamble of the bill will give a more succinct explanation than any I can possibly make, and I will read it. It is as follows:

Whereas on the 22d of August, 1864, at Geneva, Switzerland, plenipotentiaries respectively representing Italy, Baden, Belgium, Denmark, Spain, Portugal, France, Prussia, Saxony, and Wurtemburg, and the federal council of Switzerland agreed upon ten articles of a treaty or convention for the purpose of mitigating the evils inseparable from war; of suppressing the needless severity, and ameliorating the condition of soldiers wounded on the field of battle; and particularly providing, among other things in effect, that persons employed in hospitals, and in affording relief to the sick and wounded, and supplies for this purpose, shall be deemed neutral and entitled to protection; and that a distinctive and uniform flag shall be adopted for hospitals and ambulances and convoys of sick and wounded, and an arm badge for individuals neutralized; and

Whereas said treaty has been ratified by all of said nations, and by others subsequently, to the number of thirty-six or more, including the United States of America; and

Whereas article 7 of said treaty specifies the adoption and use of a special insignia, which shall be the distinctive sign of the Red Cross alone, under which insignia or sign the purpose of the treaty shall be carried into effect, the same being a red Greek cross on a white ground, and which shall constitute the military hospital flag of all the nations within the treaty, and designate all persons serving under it, and the same is adopted and used throughout the world; and

Whereas the unauthorized use of said insignia in all countries within the treaty has become a source of embarrassment and serious injury to the military and naval sanitary service of the country in time of war; and

Whereas intricate and perplexing complications arise by the indiscriminate and unauthorized use of the red cross in calamities and catastrophies in time of peace; and

Whereas all the nations most interested in the development of this treaty and its humane and provident work have already taken action to forbid the unauthorized use of its name and insignia; and

Whereas, from the international character of the treaty, it becomes necessary that there be in every nation within the treaty one body or organization in which the power to regulate the use and protect the rights of the insignia and name of the Red Cross shall vest, and that power is established by custom in every nation under the name and known as the central committee of that country, and through which body alone the international committee communicates with that government: Now, therefore, for the purpose of extending protection to this international and universal insignia in the United States of America,

Then the bill provides:

That from and after the passage of this act it shall be unlawful for any person or association of persons within the jurisdiction of the United States of America to wear or display the sign of the Red Cross above described, or any colorable imitation of said insignia, without permission from the American National Red Cross (a duly authorized and recognized body incorporated under the laws for the District of Columbia, and corresponding to the central committee described in the last preceding paragraph of the preamble), for the purpose of collecting, soliciting, or receiving money or material—

That is the first clause—

or who shall, by the use of said symbol or name of the American National Red Cross, do, or attempt to do, similar work to the American National Red Cross without permission from said organization, etc.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the purpose I had in view in making the request that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] should be heard was that I did not hear the reply he made to the inquiry of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] as to whether or not the body designated in the bill is an incorporated body, and if so, by what power it has been incorporated. I presume the Senator answered the question, but we could not hear his answer, and I wanted the information.

Mr. GRAY. It is made a corporation of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BACON. As I have said, I did not hear the Senator's answer, and that was the only object I had in rising.

Mr. HOAR. There seems to be an error in the fifteenth line of the bill. After the word "to" there should be inserted the words "that of."

Mr. GRAY. I presume the Senator is right, though I have not a copy of the bill at this instant before me.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator from Delaware will give me his attention, the bill says that any person who shall do "similar work to the American National Red Cross," meaning, of course, similar work to that of the American National Red Cross.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 15, after the word "to," it is proposed to insert the words "that of;" so as to read:

or who shall, by the use of said symbol or name of the American National Red Cross do, or attempt to do, similar work to that of the American National Red Cross, without permission from said organization, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. In the preamble there is also a similar grammatical error or want of fullness. After the word "severity," in the seventh line, the words "of war" ought to be added.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that the amendment and adoption of the preamble will follow the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOAR. I thought the bill had passed.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. PETTUS. I desire to inquire of the Senators who have charge of the bill whether there is not danger in saying that a man shall be punished for doing a work of like kind.

Mr. GRAY. I think the Senator, if he has a copy of the bill before him——

Mr. PETTUS. No, sir; I have not: I have only heard it read.

Mr. GRAY. I have not a copy, either, at this moment, but I think the Senator will find that the punishment is to be imposed for doing a work of like kind under the guise or symbol of the Red Cross.

Mr. PETTUS. That is the very danger to which I am referring. The Red Cross is a hospital cross, and why should it not be used if it is not used to collect money or to commit fraud? Why should it not be used by a hospital or by anybody if the proper authorities are not there? Will the Secretary kindly hand me a copy of the bill?

Mr. GRAY. I send one to the Senator.

Mr. PETTUS. So far as there is an attempt to collect money or things of that sort under a false representation, I see no objection to the imposition of a penalty; but in line 14, on page 3, a penalty is imposed on one who attempts "to do similar work to that of the American National Red Cross without permission from said organization."

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to call his attention, before he proceeds, to what that is intended to accomplish?

Mr. PETTUS. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. The Red Cross Society has a symbol, which, by treaties on the part of all these nations, is respected on the theater of war and on the field of battle. Of course they must have the most ample guaranty that its work is prosecuted in most absolute good faith, otherwise it would be made a means of use by spies for hostile or treacherous operations. Anybody who goes on a field of battle with a flag of the Red Cross in his hands each combatant is entitled to be assured is there solely for this neutral and humane purpose, and therefore the use of the symbol or flag in that work ought to be by the Red Cross Society alone, who are responsible and whom the nations will trust.

Now, if any stranger may, under the guise of prosecuting humane work, go within the military lines of a combatant he might abuse the privilege. So it seems to me the bill is entirely right, and it ought to prohibit anybody intending to relieve even a wounded soldier flourishing this red cross when he has no right to do so. Otherwise the whole thing must break down and fail.

Mr. PETTUS. It seems to me, Mr. President, that so far as this bill attempts to punish the conduct or the doing of anything which the Red Cross Society is called on to do, it goes too far.

Mr. HOAR. It does not.

Mr. PETTUS. Unless there is some bad intention connected with it, such as the collection of money and appropriating it to its own use.

Mr. HOAR. It only punishes such an act when it is attempted to do the work by the use of the symbol and name of the Red Cross, but not the doing of the work without that. I suppose if the Senator from Alabama were engaged in the most charitable work in the world and received the respect of all mankind, as he certainly would, it would be entirely proper to say that nobody else should do the most charitable work in the world pretending that he was the Senator from Alabama. That is all this bill proposes to punish. It proposes to punish the pretense by a person who is not so authorized of being authorized by this society.

Mr. PETTUS. It seems to me that it is putting too much power in the hands of a private society. The matter of the protection of a hospital on the field of battle is too important to be allowed to go entirely into the hands of a private society.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama if he considers a society which is recognized by eight or ten of the principal civilized nations of the world, recognized even by Turkey, so that the noble and illustrious lady who is at the head of the organization penetrated into the horrors of the recent condition of things in Turkey and ministered to the persons there in distress, a private society?

Mr. HALE. Earlier in the debate I asked the same question which the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS] has raised. It seemed to me as I first read the bill that others ought not to be interfered with because they might be doing the same work as this association, but I felt that I was answered when the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] called my attention to the fact, which has just been brought out by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], that it only applied to persons or associations doing the same work who were using, without permission, the badges or symbols of this association. Therefore I felt that the provision was not too strong under those circumstances.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOAR. I move to amend the preamble in line 7, on page 1, by striking out the word "the" and inserting the word "its."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 7 of the preamble, page 1, after the word "suppressing," it is proposed to strike out the word "the" and insert "its;" so as to read:

For the purpose of mitigating the evils inseparable from war; of suppressing its needless severity, and ameliorating the condition of soldiers wounded on the field of battle.

The amendment was agreed to.

The preamble as amended was agreed to.

PROCEEDS OF PUBLIC-LAND SALES IN CALIFORNIA.

The bill (S. 99) granting to the State of California 5 per cent of the net proceeds of the cash sales of public lands in said State was announced as next in order.

Mr. HALE. Let that go over, Mr. President, retaining its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the bill will be passed over, retaining its place.

TWYMAN O. ABBOTT.

The bill (S. 356) for the relief of Twyman O. Abbott was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to Twyman O. Abbott, of Tacoma, State of Washington, his heirs or legal representatives, the sum of $10,967.75, in full and final settlement of his claim for damages sustained by reason of the breach of a certain contract for lease of a building and ground for post-office purposes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RINALDO P. SMITH.

The bill (S. 1197) for the relief of Rinaldo P. Smith, of Baltimore, Md., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to empower the Court of Claims to hear and determine the claim of Rinaldo P. Smith, of Baltimore, Md., against the Government of the United States on account of the sale, purchase, or occupation by the Government, through its internal-revenue officers or others, of certain real estate of one George J. Stephens, in Greene County, Va., upon which the late firm of Smith, Ellett & Co., now represented by Rinaldo P. Smith, had a prior lien, and to waive the right of the Government to plead the statute of limitations in bar of the claim, and provides that the claimant shall file his petition within sixty days from the passage of this act in the Court of Claims, either at law or in equity, as he may deem the rights of his case shall require; and the Government shall, upon notice served according to the rules and practice of the court, appear and defend against the suit, and it shall proceed to final hearing and judgment, with the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States by either party, as provided by law.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADMINISTRATOR OF ESTATE OF WILLIAM B. THAYER.

The bill (S. 135) for the relief of George F. Roberts, administrator of the estate of William B. Thayer, deceased, surviving partner of Thayer Bros., and others was announced as next in order.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that that bill may be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the bill will be passed over.

ESTATE OF A. H. HERR.

The bill (S. 546) for the relief of the estate of A. H. Herr, deceased, late of the District of Columbia, was announced as the next in order; and the bill was read.

Mr. PETTUS. I ask that the report in that case may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report submitted by Mr. STEWART May 25, 1897, but before concluding was interrupted by Mr. ALLISON. I think the bill had better be passed over for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the bill will be passed over.

ADMINISTRATORS OF ISAAC P. TICE.

The bill (S. 466) for the relief of the administrators of Isaac P. Tice, deceased, and others was announced as next in order.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that that bill may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over under the objection made by the Senator from Iowa.

CLASSIFICATION OF LANDS IN CALIFORNIA.

The bill (S. 1123) to provide for the examination and classification of certain lands in the State of California was announced as next in order.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] desiring to be present when that bill is taken up, I ask that it may be passed over without prejudice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be made.

MARBLE BUSTS OF THE VICE-PRESIDENTS.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution reported by Mr. HANSBROUGH from the Committee on the Library May 26, 1897, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, That Senate resolution of May 13, 1886, providing for marble busts of those who have been Vice-Presidents of the United States to be placed in the vacant niches of the Senate Chamber, be amended as follows:

Amend by striking out the words "vacant niches of the Senate Chamber," and insert in lieu thereof the words "Senate wing of the Capitol;" so as to read:

"Resolved, That marble busts of those who have been Vice-Presidents of the United States shall be placed in the Senate wing of the Capitol from time to time; that the Architect of the Capitol is authorized, subject to the advice and approval of the Senate Committee on the Library, to carry into execution the object of this resolution, and the expenses incurred in doing so shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate."

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I suggest that the report be read. There is a brief report which explains the necessity for the passage of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. HANSBROUGH May 26, 1897, as follows:

The Committee on the Library, to which was referred Senate resolution No. 112, has had the same under consideration and beg leave to make the following report:

The Senate resolution of May 13, 1886, which it is proposed to amend, provided for the execution of marble busts of the Vice-Presidents and locations of the same in the vacant niches of the Senate Chamber. It is now found that busts of all the Vice-Presidents have been procured with the exception of two, Vice-President Johnson and Vice-President Tyler. The vacant niches in the Senate Chamber have been filled, leaving no place for the busts of the two above-mentioned Vice-Presidents, or for any subsequent Vice-Presidents. It is proposed to extend the operation of the resolution of May 13, 1886, so that the busts, as they are executed, may be placed in the vacant niches of the Senate wing of the Capitol, it being the opinion of the committee that, the vacant niches of the Senate Chamber being filled, there no longer exists authority under the resolution of May 13, 1886, unless amended, to procure any additional busts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

WARREN HALL.

The bill (S. 663) for the relief of Warren Hall was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PETTUS. Let the report in that case be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. STEWART May 26, 1897, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 663) for the relief of Warren Hall, having considered the same, beg leave to report as follows:

A bill similar to this one passed the Senate at the last session, and was favorably reported to the House. It has been favorably reported to the Senate and House at least five times. The report made by this committee at the last session is adopted as a part of this report, and your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The report is as follows:

[Senate Report No. 1273, Fifty-fourth Congress, second session.]

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 514) for the relief of Warren Hall, having considered the same, report as follows:

This bill was before your committee in several Congresses. At each time it has been favorably reported by your committee and passed by the Senate. It has also been favorably reported by the House Committee on Claims. Your committee adopt the report made in the last Congress as a part hereof and recommend the passage of the bill.

The report is as follows:

[Senate Report No. 821, Fifty-third Congress, third session.]

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1894) for the relief of Warren Hall, having considered the same, report as follows:

A bill similar to this was before your committee in the last Congress, and a favorable report made thereon, after which it passed the Senate. It has been favorably reported by the House Committee on Claims at this session, but so far no further action has been taken thereon. Your committee concur in the report, made in the last Congress, adopt it as a part of this report, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The report made in the Fifty-second Congress is as follows:

"The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 789) for the relief of Warren Hall, after due consideration, report as follows:

"This bill was considered by your committee in the Fiftieth Congress, and a favorable report made thereon, after which it passed the Senate. It was favorably reported in the House in the first session of the Fifty-first Congress, and also at this session. There are no new facts in the case. Your committee concur in the report made by Mr. HOAR in the Fiftieth Congress and make it a part of this report, and recommend the passage of the bill."

[Senate Report No 2462, Fiftieth Congress, second session.]

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 902) for the relief of Warren Hall, have considered the same, and respectfully report:

Warren Hall, the claimant, alleges that he is the son of a free woman, an Indian, and that he was born in the city of Alexandria; that when a youth he was kidnaped in New Orleans, where he had gone as a race rider, and sold to a planter in Mississippi by the name of Roach, by whom he was treated until 1863 in some respects as a free man and in others as a slave. Hall further claims that during this period he was allowed to raise hogs and other stock, which he exchanged with Roach for cotton, and in this way he had accumulated some seventy-five or more bales of cotton. In the year 1863 sundry lots of cotton along the Mississippi were seized by the United States troops, to be used in the fortifications at Memphis. This cotton was sold at a later date and the proceeds placed in the United States Treasury. In this cotton thus taken, used, and sold were the bales Hall claims, which he had received in exchange for his hogs, by contract with Roach, and of which he was the lawful owner.

Hall endeavored to assert his right of ownership by application to the Quartermaster-General, and by suit in the Court of Claims and in the Supreme Court of the United States, but without success, the courts holding that his condition in fact was that of a slave, and that in consequence he was incapable of making contracts or of acquiring property.

It would seem to your committee that under these facts injustice is done to Hall by enforcing the harsh rule of slavery in his case. If the story of his birth be true, he was by law freeborn and his mother was a free woman, and her legal status would determine his. His servitude, therefore, was the result of force and not of law. He was still a freeman, although unable to assert his freedom.

The bill under consideration is intended to refer the entire case to the Court of Claims, removing simply the bar of limitation and the hitherto insuperable bar of so-called "slavery de facto." Hall then would be allowed to prove his free birth, the contract with Roach, and his title to the property, if possible.

Some questions have been raised in the course of the investigation as to the good faith and genuineness of Hall's claim. All these questions would be passed upon by the court if the proposed statute be enacted, and the burden will be upon him to establish his title in all respects.

Your committee recommend, therefore, the passage of the bill with the following amendment: In line 8, after the word "trial," insert "if it shall appear that said Hall was in fact freeborn he shall be deemed to be entitled to all such rights as he would have had if he had continued a freeman, notwithstanding he may have been reduced to a state of slavery de facto by the operation of the laws of any State."

Mr. PETTUS. If it be in order, I object to the further consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the bill will go over.

C. J. BARONETT AND OTHERS.

The bill (S. 1040) to provide compensation for a bridge and for buildings and other improvements constructed by certain persons upon public lands afterwards set apart and reserved as the Yellowstone National Park was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to the several persons named the several sums mentioned as full and final compensation for a certain bridge, buildings, and other improvements constructed and made by them upon public lands afterwards reserved and set apart as the Yellowstone National Park, namely:

To C. J. Baronett, of Gardiner, Mont., $5,000.

To James C. McCartney, of Gardiner, Mont., $3,000.

To Matthew McGuirk, of Los Angeles, Cal., $1,000.

Mr. PETTUS. I ask that the report be read.

Mr. CARTER. The report being quite extensive, I may be able to explain the case to the satisfaction of the Senator from Alabama more briefly and perchance in more satisfactory manner than to listen to the long report.

When the Yellowstone National Park was set apart as a national pleasure ground, there existed within its limits, as laid out, certain homestead and other claims held by citizens of the United States. A certain man named Baronett had erected a bridge across the Yellowstone River at a cost considerably in excess of the amount allowed by the bill as compensation. When the park boundaries were defined, the bridge was included within the exterior limits. The United States from that time to this has used the bridge, excluded Baronett from its use, and practically confiscated the property by including the bridge within the limits of the park.

The same is true with reference to the homestead claims and improvements thereon of the other parties named in the bill. The Secretaries of the Interior have successively recommended the adjustment of these claims for many years past. The bill in its present form, I believe, has repeatedly passed the Senate. It has never failed to receive the favorable report of the committee to which it has been referred. It is meritorious in every particular and constitutes a measure of justice long deferred.

Mr. VEST. I suppose it is hardly necessary to add anything to what has been stated by the Senator from Montana; but I happen to know personally that the facts as he has recited them are true. The bridge was erected by an old trapper called Jack Baronett before the United States, in 1872, segregated this reservation. He put it there as a toll bridge; but after the Government had created the park of course he could collect no further tolls. The Government appropriated the bridge to its own use and has used it since.

The same can be said in regard to the buildings at Mammoth Hot Springs. There never was a more meritorious claim presented to Congress.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT NEWPORT NEWS, VA.

The bill (S. 1964) for the erection of a public building for the use of the custom-house and post-office at Newport News, in the district of Newport News, Va., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire a site and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, for the United States custom-house, post-office, and other Government offices, in the city of Newport News, Va., the cost of the site and building, including the vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, complete, not to exceed $100,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

M. S. HELLMAN.

The bill (S. 967) for the relief of M. S. Hellman was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of War and the proper accounting officers of the Government to charge to M. S. Hellman, of Canyon City, Oreg., $1,000 in full for all damages sustained by the United States for the breach of his contract, made July 5, 1871, for the supply of flour at Camp Warner, Oreg., remitting all further claims of damage under the contract, and to settle and adjust his unsettled accounts with the Government, after the deduction of the above sum of $1,000; and the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to pay the balance found due Hellman upon the proper vouchers therefor.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PORTLAND COMPANY, OF PORTLAND, ME.

The bill (S. 1029) for the relief of the Portland Company, of Portland, Me., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to the Portland Company $80,867.46, in full payment and discharge of the claim of the company for work done and material furnished in the construction of the United States double-ender gunboats Agawam and Pontoosuc.

Mr. PETTUS. I ask for the reading of the report.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. WARREN May 28, 1897, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1029) for the relief of the Portland Company, of Portland, Me., have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

The facts in the claim are fully set forth in Senate Report No. 752, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session, and as a similar bill has twice passed the Senate, your committee adopt said report, and recommend the passage of the bill.

[Senate Report No. 752, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2538) for the relief of the Portland Company, of Portland, Me., have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

Your committee, considering the facts set forth in House Report No. 1248, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session, to be correct, adopt the same as a part of this report and recommend the passage of the bill.

[House Report No. 1248, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7506) for the relief of the Portland Company, submit the following report:

The facts out of which this bill for relief arises will be found stated in House report from the Committee on War Claims of the Fifty-first Congress, hereto attached and made a part of this report.

The committee adopts as its report the report made by the committee of the Fifty-first Congress, and respectfully recommend the passage of the bill.

[House Report No. 3363, Fifty-first Congress, second session.]

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 12342) for the relief of the Portland Company, of Portland, Me., having had the same under consideration, beg respectfully to submit the following report:

On August 30, 1862, the Navy Department entered into contracts with the Portland Company, of Portland, Me., for the construction of the machinery, engines, and boilers for the two double-ender gunboats Agawam and Pontoosuc, the contract price in each case being $82,000. By the terms of these contracts the machinery of the Agawam was to be completed and delivered to the Government by June 5, 1863, or within one month and a half from April 21, 1863, the date of receiving from the builders the hull of said vessel, while the machinery of the Pontoosuc was to be completed and delivered by July 5, 1863, or within one month and a half from May 20, 1863, the date of receiving the hull of said vessel from the contractors.

The records show that the machinery of the former—the Agawam—was not completed and delivered until November 30, 1863, or six months, lacking five days, after the time specified, while that of the Pontoosuc was not completed and delivered until April 14, 1864, or nine months and ten days subsequent to the date specified in the contract for completion and delivery.

It is claimed by the claimant—and there is some evidence before your committee tending to support the claim—that the contracts were entered into at the urgent request of prominent navy officials, acting under instructions from the Navy Department, and in advance of the preparation of the working drawings and under what may be not improperly described as threats that unless the contracts were taken on the terms proposed by the Department, viz, of $82,000 each, or $164,000 for the two, the company would by the Department be placed on the blacklist, or in the category of those establishments not entitled to the patronage of the Department in the future; and still further, that a failure to accept the offer made by the Department to take these contracts would result in a probability that claimant's shop would be taken possession of by the Department and operated exclusively for the Government work.

The claim is further made, and there is evidence tending to support the allegation, that a positive assurance was given to claimants before and at the time of entering into said contracts and as inducements moving thereto by Benjamin F. Isherwood, chief engineer in the United States Navy, then Chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering in the Navy Department, acting, it is claimed, under instructions and authority from the Department, to the effect that the weight of the engines and boilers to be constructed for the double-enders Agawam and Pontoosuc would be about the same, or at most not exceeding 15 per cent, in weight of those of the Paul Jones, a vessel then constructed, and the weight and cost of which were well known to the Department and these contractors. The weight of the machinery and appliances of the Paul Jones was, at the time of entering into said contract, stated, known, and understood to be about 387,398 pounds.

It is further claimed that the working drawings of the Agawam and Pontoosuc were furnished by the Department for the different parts of the engines only as the work progressed, and it is alleged the great excess of weight over that of the machinery of the Paul Jones was not ascertained until after the materials were all ordered and much of the work was done. Furthermore, it was found when the engines were completed that they greatly exceeded in weight those of the Paul Jones—the former weighing over 600,000 pounds—the difference in weight being over 60 per cent of that of the Paul Jones, instead of not exceeding 15 per cent as per representations of Department officials, and thus adding largely to the cost both of the material and labor in the work of construction.

It is insisted by claimant that the delay in the completion and delivery of the machinery for these vessels in the one case, that of the Agawam, nearly six months, and in the other, the Pontoosuc, nine months and nine days, was not occasioned by any fault of the claimants, but by that of the Navy Department, and that during such delay the price of labor and materials was abnormally advanced by reason of the war of the rebellion, and thus the cost to claimants of the construction of said machinery was largely increased. They allege, and the evidence on this point seems quite conclusive, that the actual cost to claimants in constructing this machinery for the two vessels named, not including any charge for condemned material or faulty workmanship, nor for the use of tools, nor interest on money, and including only the actual cost of material and labor, with the single exception of the castings made by the company, which were estimated for and in which there might have been, it is conceded, a small profit, was $222,606.79. In addition, a claim for extra work not included in the foregoing statement is also submitted, amounting to the sum of $1,219.37, making a total of actual money paid out of $223,826.16.

From this deduct the contract price of the two vessels, viz, $164,000, leaving an excess of actual expenditure over contract price of $59,826.16, while if to this should be added a claim on the part of claimants, which it is insisted—and not without considerable reason as to the principle upon which the claim is based, although your committee would consider the percentage of amount claimed as somewhat extravagant—should be considered as part of the actual cost of the vessel's machinery, estimated at 12 per cent of the whole amount, for proportion to general expenses in running the work, and which if allowed would amount to $26,712, making a total loss to claimants, flowing in this manner and giving them the full benefit of their claim, of $86,538.88.

This claim was submitted to Congress in connection with other similar claims, and on March 9, 1865, the Senate passed the following resolution:

"IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, March 9, 1865.

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to organize a board of not less than three competent persons, whose duty it shall be to inquire into and determine how much the vessels of war and steam machinery contracted for by the Department in the years 1862 and 1863 cost the contractors over and above the contract price, and the allowance for extra work, and report the same to the Senate at its next session, none but those who have given satisfaction to the Department to be considered."

Under said resolution the honorable Secretary of the Navy appointed a board, consisting of Commodore Thomas O. Selfridge, Chief Engineer Alexander Henderson, and Paymaster C. H. Eldridge, which convened at the Brooklyn Navy-Yard June 6, 1865, and continued in session for more than six months.

The Portland Company, coming under the terms of said resolution, presented their claim to said board with the vouchers and the evidence in support of it.

See Senate Executive Document No. 18, Thirty-ninth Congress, first session, page 61, as follows:

The board, after a critical examination of the bills of cost presented by the several contractors for vessels and steam machinery contracted for in the years 1862 and 1863, who have appeared and made sworn statements, has determined the excess of cost in the several cases over and above the contract price and allowance for extra work to be as follows:

Engine and boilers for the wooden double-ender Agawam	$40,433.73
Engines and boilers for the wooden double-ender Pontoosuc	40,433.73
Total	80,867.46

All of which is respectfully submitted.

THOMAS O. SELFRIDGE,
Commodore, and President of Board.
MONTGOMERY FLETCHER,
Chief Engineer.
CHAS. H. ELDRIDGE,
Paymaster.

Hon. GIDEON WELLES,
Secretary of the Navy, Washington, D. C.

This investigation and report covered and included contracts for the construction of hulls and machinery of some twenty-six other vessels.

On January 31, 1866, this report was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate, which committee, on March 22, 1866, made a report thereon (No. 45, first session Thirty-ninth Congress), accompanying a bill for the payment of the awards thus made. In said report the committee say:

"From June till December last, the board organized by the Secretary of the Navy, under the Senate resolution, composed of eminent officers of the Navy, was engaged in hearing evidence and investigating the claims of these parties. That investigation seems to have been fairly, carefully, and thoroughly made. It was by officers of the Department, and the award, which the committee believe to be substantially right, should be adopted as the basis of relief to the parties, and therefore the committee report the accompanying bill."

This claim was never presented, as will appear from the following communication of date May 19, 1890, from the Secretary of the Navy, to what is familiarly and commonly known as the "Marchand Board," organized under the act of Congress of March 2, 1867:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, May 19, 1890.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 5th ultimo inclosing a bill (S. 473) "for the relief of the Portland Company, of Portland, Me.," and requesting such information as the records of this Department may afford relating to the claim of that company "for work done and material furnished in the construction of the United States double-ender gunboats Agawam and Pontoosuc, as per report of Thomas O. Selfridge, commodore and president of board, Senate Executive Document No. 18, first session Thirty-ninth Congress."

In reply I have to state that under date of May 25, 1865, in pursuance of the following resolution, passed by the Senate on the 9th of March of that year, viz—

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to organize a board of not less than three persons, whose duty it shall be to inquire into and examine how much the vessels of war and machinery contracted for by the Department in the years 1862 and 1863 cost the contractors, over and above the contract price and allowance for extra work, and report the same to the Senate at its next session. None but those who have given satisfaction to the Department to be considered"— the Secretary of the Navy appointed a board, of which Rear-Admiral (then Commodore) Thomas O. Selfridge was the presiding officer, to inquire into and determine the cost to the contractors, over and above the contract price and allowance for extra work, of the vessels and steam machinery contracted for by the Department during the years designated in the resolution.

The board completed its duties on the 23d of December, 1865, and submitted its report to the Department. After a careful search the original of this report can not be found upon the files, but the records of the Department show that under date of January 30, 1866, a copy of the record of the board was transmitted to the Senate. The record was thereupon printed as Senate Executive Document No. 18, first session of the Thirty-ninth Congress.

It appears from the record of the board (page 62 of the executive document referred to) that the excess in cost to the Portland Company under their contracts with the Department for the construction of the machinery of the wooden double-enders Agawam and Pontoosuc was determined by the board to be $40,433.73 in the case of each vessel, or for both of the vessels $80,867.46, the sum mentioned in the bill.

The records of the Department also show that the Department entered into contracts with the Portland Company, under date of August 30, 1862, for the construction of the machinery of the Agawam and Pontoosuc, the contract price in each case being $82,000. With regard to payments under these contracts, the Bureau of Steam Engineering reports that all the payments were regularly made in the case of each vessel to the full amount named in the contracts, and that the bills for the steam trials, amounting to $4,838.38 for the Agawam and $2,564.21 for the Pontoosuc, were also paid in full.

In pursuance of an act of Congress approved March 2, 1867 (Statutes at Large, volume 14, page 424), which directed the Secretary of the Navy "to investigate the claims of all contractors for building vessels of war and steam machinery for the same under contracts made after the 1st day of May, 1861, and prior to the 1st day of January, 1864, and to report to Congress a tabular statement of each case, which shall contain the name of the contractor, a description of the work, the contract price, the whole increased cost of the work over the contract price, and the amount of such increased cost caused by the delay and action of the Government aforesaid, and the amount already paid the contractor over and above the contract price," the Department appointed a board, of which Commodore J. B. Marchand was the presiding officer, to examine the several claims presented; but it does not appear that the claim of the Portland Company on account of the construction of the machinery of the Agawam and Pontoosuc provided for in the bill under consideration was presented or reported upon by this board. The report of the Marchand Board is contained in Senate Executive Document No. 3, Fortieth Congress, second session.

Very respectfully,

B. F. TRACY,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. JOHN H. MITCHELL,
Committee on Claims, United States Senate.

As illustrating the statement, supra, as to the means employed by the chief engineering officer of the Navy Department, presumably under instructions from the Department, superinduced, it is true, doubtless, by the pressing necessity growing out of actual and flagrant war, your committee beg to attract attention to the following extracts from the sworn testimony of Chief Engineer Benjamin F. Isherwood, given in the city of New York, November 6, 1873, in the case of The Washington Iron Works, for the use of George M. Clapp, v. The United States, then pending in the Court of Claims, and growing out of a contract of even date with those now under consideration, for the construction of the double-ender gunboat Lenapee and which was one of the twenty-seven vessels, including the Agawam and Pontoosuc, contracted for about the same time and under substantially similar circumstances:

Testimony of Benjamin F. Isherwood, late Chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering in the Navy Department.

[Court of Claims of the United States. The Washington Iron Works, for the use of George M. Clapp, against The United States. No. 7169.]

NEW YORK, November 6, 1873—11 a. m.

Present for the United States, Samuel Huntington, esq.; for the claimant, Martin V. B. Bachman, esq.

BENJAMIN F. ISHERWOOD, being called by the claimant and sworn, testified as follows in response to the commissioner: My name is Benjamin F. Isherwood. I am a chief engineer in the United States Navy; am over 21 years of age; reside at 11 East Thirty-sixth street, New York City; have no interest, direct or indirect, in the claim which is the subject of this inquiry, and am not related, in any way that I know of, to the above-named claimant.

In response to Mr. Bachman:

I have been an engineer for about thirty years, and in the United States naval service as an engineer for about twenty-eight or twenty-nine years. Was in said service all of 1862 as Chief of Bureau of Steam Engineering in the Navy Department.

Question. During 1862, while acting in that capacity, did you have anything to do, on the part of the Government, with contracting for the construction of steam machinery and appurtenances for a class of vessels called double-enders?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Was the Lenapee one of that class of vessels?

Answer. It was.

Question. State, if you please, what you had to do with the making of the contracts for said machinery.

(Objected to by counsel for the United States as immaterial.)

Answer. By the direction of the Department advertisements were put in the principal papers of the country asking for sealed proposals (objected to by counsel for the United States) for the construction of the class of machinery referred to, according to specifications and plans prepared by the Bureau. In response, a number of proposals were received at varying prices, the lowest being $80,000, the next lowest $82,000. The contract for two vessels was awarded to the bidder for $80,000, and also a contract to the bidder for $82,000. The Department then decided that it would not exceed this latter price, but would offer as many contracts at that price as it could get taken. To the best of my recollection, the highest bid was $125,000. No additional offers were received for contracts at $82,000, and I was directed by the Department to personally visit the principal shops and urge upon them the acceptance of this work for the $82,000, a sum which the Department had decided not to exceed. I accordingly visited the shops, and used all the arguments I could devise to induce them to accept the work on these terms. In this way contracts for the machinery of twenty-six or twenty-seven vessels were made, and the Lenapee was one of that number. Said twenty-six or twenty-seven vessels include those that were awarded on the original proposals, as well as those taken on my personal solicitation.

(Counsel for the United States objects to whole of last answer as immaterial; and also objects to such parts of it as state the contents of written instruments, and such as state what the Department decided and ordered.)

Question. State, if you can, the names of vessels for which machinery was contracted under the circumstances you have just related.

Answer. Sassacus, Patuxet, Tallapoosa, Winooska, Mackinaw, Shamrock, Tallahoma, Taconey, Iosco, Agawam, Pontoosuc, Massasoit, Osceola, Mattabesett, Chicopee, Ascutney, Otsego, Metacomet, Chenango, Lenapee, Mendota, Mingoe, Wyalusing, Pontiac, Wateree, Eutaw, Peoria.

Question. Which two of those were awarded on the bids?

Adjourned at 11.55 a. m. till 1 p. m. November 6, 1873.

NOVEMBER 6, 1873—1 p. m.

Present for the United States: Samuel Huntington, esq.; for the claimant, Martin V. B. Bachman, esq.

Direct examination of BENJAMIN F. ISHERWOOD—Continued.

Answer. The Mendota and the Metacomet.

Question. State, if you please, what arguments you used to induce the parties who took this contract to construct the machinery to so take it.

(Counsel for the United States objects as immaterial.)

Answer. The general scope of the arguments was, that the Government was very greatly in need of this work, and that, as loyal supporters of the Government, they were bound to meet its needs; that a refusal to do so would place them in the category of those not entitled to the patronage of the Department hereafter. I also stated that unless the shops responded to the best of their ability to the exigencies of the Department I would recommend, what I had before suggested to the Department, to take possession of the shops and have them operated exclusively for the Government work.

Question. Were the engines put in the twenty-seven vessels you have named similar to those put in the vessel called the Paul Jones?

(Counsel for the United States objects to question as immaterial.)

Answer. They were of the same type, but of very different dimensions.

Question. In what respect?

Answer. The engines of the Lenapee were about 81 per cent larger than those of the Paul Jones, making the comparison by capacity of cylinder. The diameter of the cylinder of the Paul Jones was 48 inches, and its stroke of piston 7 feet. The diameter of the cylinder of the Lenapee was 58 inches, and its stroke of piston 8½ feet.

Question. What was the weight of the machinery and appurtenances in the Paul Jones?

(Counsel for the United States objects to question as immaterial.)

Answer. It was 387,398 pounds.

Question. State, if you can, the weight of the machinery and appurtenances in the Lenapee.

Answer. Five hundred and thirty-two thousand and ten pounds.

Question. Were you at that time acquainted with the costs of construction of naval machinery of that class?

Answer. I had a general opinion of it, but, not being a builder, I could not depend on that opinion as precise.

Question. Have you since that time become familiar with the subject?

Answer. I have.

Question. Was or was not $82,000 a fair price for the construction of the machinery and appurtenances for the Lenapee, in your opinion?

(Counsel for the United States objects to question as immaterial.)

Answer. I think it was inadequate.

Cross-examined by SAMUEL HUNTINGTON, Esq., counsel for the United States.

Question. How do you know the weight of the machinery and appurtenances of the Lenapee?

Answer. The contract requires the contractor to furnish an inventory of the weight and material of each part of the machinery and of all its appurtenances; and from these inventories the above weights are given.

Question. Did you ever see these inventories?

Answer. I did; they came to me in my official capacity as chief of Bureau.

Question. Did you take copies of memoranda from the inventory of the weight and material of the machinery of the Lenapee?

Answer. I had the inventories of the weights of the machinery for a large number of these vessels, all of which differed more or less, and I took the average, which is the weight given in my testimony, and the average for the whole of them was 532,010 pounds.

Question. Then, do I understand you to mean that 532,010 pounds was the exact weight of the machinery and appurtenances of the Lenapee?

Answer. No. It was the average weight of the machinery of that class, and probably varied a few per cent from the weight of the Lenapee.

Question. By whom was that average computed?

Answer. By myself.

Question. When?

Answer. In 1864 and 1865, and published in 1865 in a work entitled Experimental Researches in Steam Engineering, volume second.

By the Commissioner:

Question. Do you know of any other matter relative to the claim in question?

Answer. Not that I am aware of.

B. F. ISHERWOOD.

Subscribed and sworn before me this 6th day of November, A. D. 1873.

WILLIAM BLAIKIE,
Commissioner of the United States Court of Claims.

That claimants were losers on this contract to an amount nearly, if not quite, equal to one-half of the whole contract there can be but little doubt, as were most, if not all, of the contractors engaged in the construction of the 27 gunboats mentioned in the report of the Selfridge Board. These contracts were entered into in abnormal times. War was raging, it is true, but many were the predictions then made, by some of our ablest statesmen, that it could not and would not last more than a few months at most. Those who, gifted with the greatest prescience, could not and did not predict as to the future with any degree of accuracy, and few there were, indeed, who, in August, 1862, the date when these contracts were entered into, could have been made to believe that nearly three years from that date would find the war still raging with unabated fury, millions of men still in arms, and prices of all kinds of labor, materials, and provisions doubled or trebled in amount.

In discussing this very claim, and others of like character, Senator Sumner (see Congressional Globe, 1865, page 1892) said:

"The Senator from Kentucky said that they took the war into their calculations. Perhaps they did; but who among these contractors could take that war adequately into his calculations? Who among those sitting here or at the other end of the Avenue properly appreciated the character of the great contest that was then going on? Sir, we had passed half a century in peace; we knew nothing of war or of war preparations, when all at once we were called to efforts on this gigantic scale. Are you astonished that these contractors did not know more about the war than your statesmen? Be to these contractors as gentle in judgment and as considerate as you have been to others in public life who have erred in their calculations with regard to it."—Congressional Globe, page 1987.

"The building of that invulnerable navy was one of the great victories of the war, not to be commemorated on any special field, but to be seen in those mighty results which we all now enjoy.

"And now again I ask, Are you ready to see these contractors who have done this service sacrificed? You do not allow the soldier to be sacrificed, nor the national creditor who has taken your stock; will you allow the mechanic to be sacrificed? * * * My friend on my right (Mr. Nye) asked you to be magnanimous to these contractors. I do not put it in that way. I ask you simply to be just. Do by them as you would be done by. The Senator from Nevada also very fitly reminded you of the experience of other countries. He told you that England, at the close of the Crimean war, when her mechanics had suffered precisely as your mechanics have suffered, did not allow them to be sacrificed, but every pound and shilling of their liabilities under their contracts was promptly met by that Government. Will you be less just to your mechanics than England? It is an old saying that 'republics are ungrateful.' I hope that this Republic may certainly vie with any monarchy in gratitude to those who served it."—Congressional Globe, page 1987.

During the same debate Senator Hendricks, of Indiana (see Congressional Globe, page 1964, 1865), said:

"I am of the opinion that these sums ought to be paid, as a matter of justice and right, by the Government to these contractors. Each case, of course, has its special merits or demerits. But, sir, I believe in the doctrine that where a man contracts to do a great and very important work for the Government, he ought not to be allowed to be a large loser and in some cases, as will be the result here, to be broken up by the contract that he may have made, and especially in the case of contracts made at such a time as these were made and for such work as they were made. * * * We had to have these ships; the Government could not progress in the war without them, and great numbers had to be manufactured or contracted for about the same time. What was the effect of that? The Government made a contract with one man, then with another, then with another, and started her own shipyards with all the force it was possible to command. What was the effect of that? Of course, to increase the price of labor; of course, to increase the price of material required in the construction of the ships. There are some general views about the equity of these claims without reference to the particular merit of each case."—Congressional Globe, page 1890, 1866.

"The point is that, these contracts being made in 1862 and 1863, the prices continued to advance during all the time that these parties were building the vessels and constructing the machinery for them, so that they were overtaken by this enormously high rate of prices and destroyed."—Congressional Globe, page 1892.

"These contracts were made by some below their own propositions, and at barely fair prices at the then current rates. Is there any Senator here who wishes to see these men broken up merely because they entered into a contract with the Government? Is there any Senator here who wishes to say to these men, 'We have your bond, and we will hold you to your bond; we will take the blood out of your business; we will have the pound of flesh?' "—Congressional Globe, page 1964.

That Congress has in the past comprehended the injustice of permitting these contractors and others similarly situated to bear the immense losses they suffered under the circumstances stated has been made apparent in various proceedings, had at different times since the close of the war, sometimes by one House acting separately and independently, sometimes by the joint action of both Houses—notably in the former case the action of the Senate of March 9, 1865, which led to the organization of the Selfridge Board, and of the latter by the act of March 2, 1867, which resulted in the organization and report of the Marchand Board, to say nothing of the various special acts of Congress and numerous reports submitted from the committees of the respective Houses from time to time. Among the latter reference might be properly made to the following: Report of Senator Nye, Senate Report No. 45, second session Twenty-ninth Congress; Senate Report No. 37, second session Forty-second Congress; Representative Stone's report, No. 17, second session Thirty-ninth Congress.

A bill to pay these claimants directly the amount of their claims, as reported by the Selfridge Board, passed the House of Representatives unanimously in the third session of the Twenty-seventh Congress. Various special acts have been passed covering similar cases, some of them included in the report of the Selfridge Board, to wit:

One of the awards has been paid by joint resolution of March 30, 1867 (15 Stats., 253), by which Donahue, Ryan & Secor were paid $179,000 for losses sustained by them in constructing the Camanche. Amount allowed by the board, $179,993.80.

In addition, the following special acts have been passed to relieve contractors in similar cases, to wit:

Act of February 18, 1873, to relieve the heirs of George C. Bester, $125,000. (17 Stats., 733.)

Act of June 1, 1872, to pay Charles W. Whitney $50,000. (17 Stats., 671.)

Act of June 10, 1872, to pay J. S. Underhill $23,310.75. (17 Stats., 691).

Act of March 2, 1875, to pay Daniel S. Mershon, jr., $46,715.08. (18 Stats., 635.)

The contractors for building the Dome of the Capitol were awarded and paid $96,000 for increase in the price of labor and material during its construction. The Government prolonged the time of its completion. (See Senate Report No. 132, first session Thirty-ninth Congress.)

John Ericsson was paid $1,070,438.93 on the Puritan (United States Statutes, June 25, 1864, volume 13, 400) for increased cost of labor and materials.

Miles Greenwood, of Cincinnati, Ohio, was paid $76,000 for increased cost of labor and material in building the United States vessel Tippecanoe in 1873.

Mr. PETTUS. I object to the further consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The further consideration of the bill having been objected to, the next bill on the Calendar will be stated.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator from Alabama allow the bill to which he has objected to remain on this Calendar instead of going over to the Calendar under Rule IX?

Mr. PETTUS. I have no objection to that course. I have no objection to the bill being fairly considered.

Mr. FRYE. The bill will then retain its place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. QUAY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 2 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, January 7, 1898, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate January 6, 1898.

CONSULS.

Adolph L. Frankenthal, of Massachusetts, to be consul of the United States at Berne, Switzerland.

William A. Prickitt, of New Jersey, to be consul of the United States at Rheims, France.

Michael J. Burke, of Illinois, to be consul of the United States at Port Stanley and St. Thomas, Canada.

Edward D. Winslow, of Illinois, to be consul of the United States at Stockholm, Sweden.

Urbain J. Ledoux, of Maine, to be consul of the United States at Three Rivers, Quebec.

John N. McCunn, of Wisconsin, to be consul of the United States at Dunfermline, Scotland.

Louis H. Aymé, of Illinois, to be consul of the United States at Guadeloupe, West Indies.

W. Stanley Hollis, of Massachusetts, now consul of the United States at Mozambique, to be consul of the United States at Lourenço Marquez, Africa.

Daniel E. McGinley, of Wisconsin, to be consul of the United States at Athens, Greece.

Charles W. Merriman, of Wisconsin, to be consul of the United States at Brockville, Ontario.

George H. Moulton, of Colorado, to be consul of the United States at Demerara, British Guiana.

INDIAN AGENT.

Edwin M. Yearian, of Junction, Idaho, to be agent for the Indians of the Lemhi Agency in Idaho.

ASSISTANT APPRAISER OF MERCHANDISE.

Alfred W. Brown, of Massachusetts, to be assistant appraiser of merchandise in the district of Boston and Charlestown, in the State of Massachusetts.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 6, 1898.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

RESIGNATION AND APPOINTMENT OF OFFICIAL REPORTER OF DEBATES.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has been notified that Mr. Andrew Devine, one of the official reporters of debates of the House of Representatives, resigns his position; and the Chair therefore appoints Mr. Reuel Small, of Deering, Me., to be an official reporter of debates in his place.

THE CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the remaining provision of the legislative appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. HOPKINS in the chair.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. GROSVENOR.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman from Ohio begins, I desire to say simply a word to the committee. A number of gentlemen on this side of the House who have not had an opportunity to be heard wish to speak on this question. I think, therefore, it is important at this time that there should be some understanding that no extension of time will be made to-day. If unlimited time is given, as has heretofore been the case in this debate, it will deprive many gentlemen on this side, as well as on the other, of an opportunity of being heard at all.

Mr. MOODY. I understand the gentleman to suggest that the understanding be entered into now as to the expiration of the debate?

Mr. DOCKERY. No; my suggestion was, as far as practicable, that there shall be no extension of time to-day. I know it is considered somewhat discourteous to object to a request for an extension of time to any member who is occupying the floor. But if the time is extended, as it was yesterday, without limit, necessarily it will deprive other gentlemen of an opportunity of being heard at all.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I hope his proposition will not be insisted upon just at the present time. If I had a moment's opportunity to speak to my friend from Missouri privately, I could satisfy him that there may be reasons for an exception to that rule. I shall myself ask the committee to extend my time, as I do not think an hour will be sufficient, and hope it will be granted. I shall not take, however, any more time in the debate upon this question. It may be that I shall only occupy the hour, but I dislike very much under the circumstances to feel cramped and limited, and know my friend from Missouri fully appreciates the condition.

Mr. DOCKERY. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will have ample time——

Mr. BROSIUS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio shall have leave to conclude his remarks without interruption.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I have no objection to that request, Mr. Chairman, if the same privileges are accorded to others. I shall desire to occupy the floor myself perhaps to-day on this question, and may need an extension of time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will couple his request with the further understanding that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] shall be allowed the same length of time that is accorded to the gentleman from Ohio to reply.

Mr. DOCKERY. I think that is correct.

Mr. MOODY. I think, Mr. Chairman, the request should be modified so as to indicate some definite time. The granting of "leave to conclude" the gentleman's remarks is too indefinite. It seems to me that under the present circumstances there should be some definite time fixed. I understand the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] agrees with me, and will be satisfied to have a limit fixed to the time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That will be entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. BROSIUS. Then I will modify my request by asking that the gentleman from Ohio may be permitted to proceed for one hour and forty-five minutes. I understand that time is regarded by him as sufficient.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That will be satisfactory.

Mr. DOCKERY. And that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] be allowed the same time to reply.

Mr. BROSIUS. I have no objection to that.

Mr. DOCKERY. As I understand the gentleman desires to reply.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I do not know that I desire to reply to the gentleman from Ohio, but I do desire to express myself on this subject, and may want a little more time than the rules allow in the ordinary course of debates.

Mr. BROSIUS. I would suggest now that I desire to reply to a good many statements that have been made in this discussion, but prefer to postpone my address until later.

Mr. DOCKERY. I should certainly not interpose objection to any time that the chairman of the committee might desire.

Mr. BROSIUS. I have no doubt that I shall receive every courtesy from my colleague on the committee in that regard.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will submit the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the committee. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman from Ohio be allowed one hour and forty-five minutes, and also that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON], when he takes the floor in reply, may be allowed the same time. Is there objection to either request?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

[Mr. GROSVENOR addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Chairman, on the 14th day of December, while making some remarks on this subject, and making use of no opprobrious statements about any member, I was frequently interrupted by the gentleman from Ohio, and in every instance I gladly yielded to his question. This morning he took occasion to use an opprobrious description, which he afterwards said he applied to me. I asked for time to reply to it. He refused to yield, and further went on to illustrate the statement by an anecdote or story which was a disgrace for any man on this floor to apply to another and a disgrace for this House to sit and listen to.

Now, let me call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio to the way such treatment has been considered heretofore; and I trust he will listen to what I am about to read. On the 17th of May, 1890, the House then being Republican, Mr. Bynum, of Indiana, was assailed in much the same way that I was assailed this morning. He demanded the right to be heard in reply. Objection was made on the floor of this House, and a member of the House on the floor that day made this statement, which I commend to the fairness of members here present. He said:

> I hope, Mr. Chairman, that whatever may be the technical rule about this, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Bynum] may be permitted to proceed. [Applause.] Let us have fair play, whatever may be our rules.

That was what Mr. McKinley, of Ohio, asked for a political opponent when he had been unfairly attacked on this floor. [Applause.]

Now, I want the gentleman from Ohio to listen still further. The gentleman in the chair made this remark:

> It can not be possible that if a member of the House is assailed here in Committee of the Whole House he must wait until to-morrow morning or until some subsequent day before he can ever be heard to defend himself.

And then he went on:

> The Chair declines to hear any further argument upon the question. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Indiana is entitled to the floor and will recognize no one until he proceeds.

Who was it that asked if any man could be so unfair as to refuse a member the right to reply when assailed; who was it that asked if the House proposed to wait until next day before he could be recognized as having the right to the floor, and who was it that recognized that man, and would recognize no other—fair that day, whatever he may be now? That was the Hon. CHARLES H. GROSVENOR of Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. He is always that way.

Mr. BARRETT. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not want to go on with this controversy any further as to the remark made about me by the gentleman from Ohio because I had attempted to stand up and defend the President of the United States, which the gentleman followed up by a story which could only be heard in political meetings where most of us would not care to be. I leave the matter where it deserves to be left, to the contempt of every man who believes that when a member on this floor calls another man by a name, he is the last man of all to stand upon his fancied prerogative and refuse him the right to make a reply. [Applause.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that I left open a matter that may be improperly construed when I referred to the statement of a gentleman in the Chicago convention, who made the remark, "I carry my sovereignty in my hat." I quoted that from memory, and it was the utterance of the Hon. A. W. Campbell, of Wheeling, W. Va. In my subsequent remarks it may have been inferred that I intended to say that that gentleman was one of the betrayers of Blaine. Mr. Campbell was one of the most earnest and faithful friends of Mr. Blaine; voted for him and supported him all the way through.

Now, as to my refusal to yield the tenth or fifteenth time in this discussion, I can only say that there are conditions requiring remedies that sometimes we do not like to apply. But if the thing can not be stopped any other way, sometimes we have to do it. That is all. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Chairman, no man on this floor has a greater respect for the venerable gentleman from Ohio than I have, but I do think that of all things men ought not to do, especially a man of the long experience, guarded and fortified by precedent and long knowledge amongst men, such as that gentleman had, it is to make a reply to a fair and honest statement of position by any such small, unbecoming suggestions and imputations as made by that gentleman. I leave it to the gentleman from Ohio who it was that first introduced any opprobrious epithets here and who has stuck to them.

I want to say that when the rules come up in this House, as they will in ten or fifteen days, I propose to take a little time to give a few of my experiences and state some of the scenes that I have observed upon this floor since I have been a member of this House; how old members are allowed, in violation of every rule and every precedent upon this floor, to go on and abuse other men, and when the new member gets up to try to assert his rights, every possible parliamentary device is applied to shut him off. [Applause.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. So far as I am concerned, the incident is closed.

A MEMBER. Regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] is recognized.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, during the first forty years of the existence of this Government, from the Administration of George Washington down to the Administration of Andrew Jackson, the spoils system was absolutely unknown. Men were not appointed to office because of their political opinions, nor were they removed from office on that account. The sole test for a place in the public service, often ascribed to Washington and more frequently to Jefferson, was: Is the applicant honest? Is he capable? Is he devoted to the Constitution? Indeed, there were very few removals from office, comparatively speaking, during all this period to which I have referred, such as occurred being invariably made bona fide and for just cause, and, as a necessary consequence, the civil service of the country was administered honestly, efficiently, and without any scandals whatever.

I want to call the attention of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY] to another matter which is quite plainly revealed in this period of our national history. That gentleman, whose quaint sayings are so pleasing, and who is always an entertaining talker, but who too frequently sacrifices exactness of statement to oratorical effect, said the other day, in the course of his remarks on this floor, that it was impossible to have party organization unless we gave the offices to our friends. He also said, in the same speech, with reference to Tammany Hall:

Tammany is omnipotent, Tammany is invincible in the face of all influence that its enemies can bring to bear. Why is this? It is because Tammany respects her friends. Tammany pensions her friends and not her enemies.

Now, I want to call the attention of this House and of the country, as well as the attention of the gentleman from North Carolina, to the fact that during this period of our national history, when the spoils system was absolutely unknown, public spirit was everywhere present to an extraordinary degree, and political parties were as active and aggressive as they have ever been in this country since the adoption of the Federal Constitution. How does the gentleman account for this? How does he reconcile this historic fact with the statement which he made, that you must hold out to the American people the temptation of bribery in order to induce them to create and maintain party organization?

When my friend spoke of Tammany Hall as an example of what organization can accomplish, when he conceded, as he did, the great power which Tammany Hall possesses by virtue of its organization, did he forget that Tammany Hall, possibly as corrupt a political organization as there is upon the face of this continent, has been able to plunder and sack a great city mainly because it has been able to employ the spoils system for the purpose of giving itself power and of maintaining itself in power? How unfortunate the gentleman was in his reference to Tammany Hall—in the character of his illustration. Mr. Chairman, if the rigid provisions of a civil-service law could only be enforced against Tammany, its career of public and private plunder would soon end, and the people of the great municipality which it had wronged would be forever emancipated from its remorseless grasp. The distribution of offices necessary to preserve virility and activity in parties! Why the history of the mother country presents the most emphatic refutation of so absurd a proposition.

Where is there greater interest in public affairs? Where do parties flourish with such strength? Where are they so formidable as in Great Britain, where all the offices are under the civil service, and where it was the boast of Mr. Gladstone, when on the dissolution of a ministry he came into power as premier to form its successor, that he had not a single office within his gift except the appointment of his own private secretary?

Why, Mr. Chairman, since 1883 the principles of civil-service reform have gradually been taking out of politics those offices which were used to corrupt the consciences of men; but has anybody discovered any diminution of party spirit or party strength during that period? In the last Presidential campaign, who thought of the offices outside of a few selfish and grasping politicians? When was there in any age or in any clime a finer exhibition of public spirit and high patriotism than was manifested when thoughtful and conservative men all over this country, without the bribe of office, came forward from the sole force of conviction, and in response to the public need, and allied themselves with the great political parties of the day?

Where is there in the nation's history a stronger example of the patriotism of men, or of utter disregard for the spoils of office, than was manifested when the hard-money Democrats of this country stepped aside from the only opportunity they had to obtain office, to wit, remaining in the Democratic camp, and as a matter of high duty threw the spoils to the winds and stood by those principles which they believed best calculated to promote the good of the whole American people?

I reject the proposition of the gentleman from North Carolina; it is a base libel on my countrymen and upon his countrymen. The American people are intelligent; they are honest; they are public-spirited. They appreciate the opportunities which they possess under a written Constitution to govern themselves. They are patriotic, and feel a profound interest in public affairs. It requires no temptation to their cupidity, no offer of individual reward, to induce them to suspend the various occupations in which they are engaged long enough to attach themselves to political parties which, while unknown to the Constitution, have become, under our peculiar system, the only vehicle whereby public sentiment can be crystallized upon the statute books of the nation.

While I am on this branch of the subject I want to advert to another matter. In the speech attacking the civil-service law which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] published in the RECORD at the last session of Congress by permission of the House, but which he did not deliver on the floor, he undertook to invoke the great name of George Washington in support of the system which he advocated; and for this purpose he read an extract from a letter which Washington once wrote to Timothy Pickering, at the time Secretary of War, which extract is in the following language:

I shall not, whilst I have the honor to administer the Government, bring a man into any office of consequence knowingly whose political tenets are adverse to the measures which the General Government are pursuing, for this, in my opinion, would be a sort of political suicide. That it would embarrass its movements is most certain. But of two men equally well affected to the true interests of their country, of equal abilities, and equally disposed to lend their support, it is the part of prudence to give the preference to him against whom the least clamor can be excited. For such a one my inquiries have been made and are still making. How far I shall succeed is at this moment problematical.

Now, the gentleman failed to state in his speech what office it was that George Washington referred to in this letter which the gentleman has in part exhumed and exploited; but the fact that Washington refers to it as an "office of consequence," and declares that an improper appointee would embarrass the movements of the Government, shows that it could not have been a mere clerical office. The truth about the matter is, it is a historic fact, that Washington, when he wrote this letter to Pickering, had in mind and was writing about one of those offices whose incumbents are the constitutional advisers of the President—to wit, the office of Attorney-General.

The sentiment, therefore, expressed in this letter is directly in line with the principles of civil service, which recognize the fact that the President must necessarily choose from partisans, from those of his own political faith, the men who are to be his constitutional advisers. The civil-service law especially excepts that class of offices from its operation, and applies only to those who have clerical duties to perform. So that this declaration of Washington does not militate in the least against the principles of the civil-service law.

But I propose to pursue the inquiry as to what were Washington's sentiments on this question a little further. In Parton's Life of Jackson I find that this great man wrote another letter, which, when I read a part of it to the House, will disclose his real views on this very important subject. The language is as follows:

My friend I receive with cordial welcome. He is welcome to my house, and welcome to my heart; but with all his good qualities he is not a man of business. His opponent, with all his politics so hostile to me, is a man of business. My private feelings have nothing to do in the case. I am not George Washington, but President of the United States. As George Washington I would do this man any kindness in my power—as President of the United States I can do nothing.

Where, Mr. Chairman, will you find anything more imbued with the spirit of civil service—whose animating principle is that offices are not the perquisites of those in power to be distributed as rewards either to their personal or political friends, but that they belong to all the American people and are held in trust for the benefit of all the people—than is found in this quotation from General Washington's letter which I have just read. I commend this lofty utterance to that class of gentlemen on this floor who characterize the public man that refuses to turn over the offices of the country to those who place and maintain him in power as an ingrate. A man has a right, sir, to be prodigal with that which is his own. He may bestow favors for kindness shown where he himself possesses that which is to be bestowed. This is gratitude. But a man who undertakes to repay either his debts or his political obligations by conveying away the public offices which do not belong to him commits that which is very closely akin to robbery.

Now, the opinion of Washington is not only manifested in this letter which I have just read, but it is very plainly disclosed by his conduct while he was Chief Executive of this Republic. In all his administration, with everything in the civil service under his control, this patriot and statesman who foresaw the dangers to which the spoils system would subject our free institutions, removed only seven men from office; and every one of them was removed, not because of his political views, but because of his unfitness. Nor did he appoint any individual to a clerical position because of his party affiliations.

Whenever any gentleman on this floor undertakes to invoke the authority of the fathers against the principle of civil service he will ransack history in vain for anything tangible with which to support his contention. I have glanced, I confess somewhat hurriedly, over the public utterances of John Adams, Thomas Jefferson, James Madison, James Monroe, and John Quincy Adams; and I affirm that their expressions are universally against the spoils system, and in favor of the administration of the offices of the Government in the interest of all the people, some of which expressions, Mr. Chairman, I shall take the liberty of inserting in the RECORD in an appendix to my remarks.

But with the advent of Andrew Jackson to the Presidency, there came a very great change in the civil service of this Government and in the methods of its administration. The controlling spirits of his Administration were a coterie, a trio of Democratic politicians in the great State of New York, where the spoils system obtained its earliest foothold in this country, and where it has committed more wrong and devastation than all other causes that have ever assailed that Commonwealth, not even excepting the evils that have befallen it from the great wars in which the country has been involved.

These three men, Van Buren, Burr, and Marcy—Marcy, who, as early as 1833, on the floor of the United States Senate, declared the pernicious doctrine, "To the victor belongs the spoils"—were, I say, the controlling spirits in shaping the policy pursued during Mr. Jackson's Administration with reference to the civil service of the United States. What was the consequence? They inoculated the President with their doctrine that the offices belonged to the individual and not to the people; that they were personal perquisites belonging to the Executive to reward his supporters; that the man who has not been for him in the contest for his high office was his enemy and should be turned out of place, and that the man who succeeded him should, in every instance, be taken from the ranks of his political partisans and supporters.

No sooner had this doctrine been learned than it was promulgated by the Executive, and thereupon the most wholesale and merciless removals were made in all branches of the public service, and widespread distress and sadness prevailed at the capital and at various other places in the land.

Mr. Chairman, no man can open the pages of Parton's Life of Jackson and read therein the graphic description which that able and impartial historian gives of the effect of this policy upon its unfortunate victims without being profoundly impressed with the cruelty of the policy and moved to sympathy for those to whom it brought so much misery.

What were the consequences resulting from this course of conduct? It was not long until it bore its legitimate fruit. I have only time, sir, to give you a few instances. In the custom-house in New York an honest and competent official was turned out from the collectorship, and Samuel Swartwout, who had been an ardent advocate of Jackson's election, was installed in his place. He had been in the office but a short time until he became a defaulter in an immense sum of money and fled precipitately from the country, taking refuge upon foreign soil in order to escape criminal prosecution for his crime. He was succeeded by Jesse Hoyt, to whom also the office was given as a reward for party services, and who was hardly inducted into office until he was also discovered to be a defaulter to a very large amount.

William M. Price, another Jackson man, sought and obtained appointment to the office of United States district attorney in New York, and he also was guilty of peculation and other crimes and brought the administration of his high position into infamous repute. The custom-house and the post-office in New York became at once great nests for political intrigues, where the officials and employees spent most of their time in devising and carrying out schemes to promote and maintain in power the politicians who had conferred position upon them, to the shameful neglect of their public duties. The public service everywhere fell into demoralization. The work was inefficiently performed. The employees were, many of them, dishonest, and scandal was common and most notorious.

The amount of losses to the Government by the misappropriation of the public moneys increased to an alarming extent, and even the most unscrupulous partisans of General Jackson and most ardent advocates of this system became alarmed at its consequences.

Mr. Parton, whose work was written thirty years after Jackson's Administration, after speaking at length of the transactions to which I have referred, concludes his observations with a summary of the effects of the spoils system as they impressed him, both as they appeared in Jackson's time and subsequently, and at the conclusion of the summary makes use of the following forcible language:

> In a word, the spoils system renders pure, decent, orderly, and democratic government impossible. Nor has any government of modern times given such wonderful proof of inherent strength as is afforded by the fact that this Government after thirty years of rotation still exists.

Mr. Chairman, I shall insert in the RECORD, in connection with my remarks, this summary of Mr. Parton's in full.

Clay, Webster, Calhoun, and other distinguished men of their day saw the evils of this spoils system and arrayed themselves uncompromisingly against it. They opposed the law which fixed the term of office at four years. In the time that it was in force in our Government in their day they were quick to see the dangers growing out of its operation and to sound the alarm to their fellow-citizens, and they allied themselves with the forces which tended to purify and elevate politics, and not to those forces which tended to tear down and destroy.

Mr. Chairman, during the course of this discussion gentlemen have not been content to claim the indorsement of Washington, but they have also sought to bring the great name and authority of Abraham Lincoln to the support of their peculiar tenets. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], in the course of his speech, which was published in the RECORD without being delivered in the House, made use of the following language:

> I appeal for the young men of my country; I appeal for a just interpretation of her laws and principles; I appeal for an application of the great principle of Abraham Lincoln's declaration that this is a Government of the people, for the people, and by the people; and to that end I will work and suffer if need be.

And further on in this same remarkable speech appears this declaration:

> This country is a fair and just test of a man's ability to perform the duties of a public officer, and I stand upon the further ground that this Government is a government of the people and by the people, and that the people should be all the people.

Mr. Chairman, there never was an effort made to prostitute this splendid aphorism of Abraham Lincoln, this felicitous characterization of our Government, delivered in the course of his address at the dedication of the soldiers' monument upon the far-famed battlefield of Gettysburg after the war, to such ignoble purpose as was made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] when he thus attempted to invoke it as a sanction to the system of spoils. The gentleman has evidently misinterpreted Mr. Lincoln's meaning. He certainly has given a misconstruction to his language. Mr. Lincoln did not declare that ours was a government of the spoilsman, for the spoilsman, and by the spoilsman, but he said a very different thing, that it was a government of the people, for the people, and by the people.

What Mr. Lincoln thought of the spoils system can be gathered, I think, very readily from that significant and memorable remark which he made to a friend just after the fall of Richmond, when, as they stood in the White House, he pointed to the importunate crowd of office seekers that were clamoring for admission at the doors of the White House, and exclaimed, "We have overthrown the rebellion, but there stands an element fraught with far more danger to the Republic than were the armed rebels whom we have subdued."

No, sir; Mr. Lincoln was a man of too much intelligence, too much good sense, too much patriotism to have any toleration for practices so dangerous to the country. He founded himself on too high a plane. While he was, doubtless, obliged to submit, like many of our Presidents have had to do, to its shameful exactions, he had too much regard for the rights of the people ever to have given the authority of his great name to a system which is nothing more nor less than legalized robbery.

Mr. Lincoln did not stand alone in this opinion. His great Secretary of War—great as a lawyer, great as an executive officer—Edwin M. Stanton, suffered constantly and unbearably from the effects of those onslaughts of the office seekers which this system entails upon all public officials, whether they will it or not. In one of his letters, published in McClure's Magazine for November, 1897, addressed by that great man to Charles A. Dana, I find that he made use of the following expressions relating to this subject:

> WASHINGTON, D. C., February 1, 1862.
> * * * To bring the War Department up to the standard of the times, and work an army of 500,000 with machinery adapted to a peace establishment of 12,000, is no easy task. This was Mr. Cameron's great trouble and the cause of much of the complaints against him. All I ask is reasonable time and patience. The pressure of members of Congress for clerk and Army appointments, notwithstanding the most stringent rules, and the persistent strain against all measures essential to obtain time for thought, combination, and conference, is discouraging in the extreme. It often tempts me to quit the helm in despair. The only consolation is the confidence and support of good and patriotic men. To their aid I look for strength.
> EDWIN M. STANTON.

Mr. Chairman, having failed to establish Washington, having failed to establish Lincoln upon the pedestal of spoils, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] have sought refuge in the affirmation that Ulysses S. Grant was a champion of their unworthy cause. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY], in the course of the same speech to which I have already referred, used the following language:

> But the crowning glory of Grant's greatness was that he stuck to his friends. [Applause.] What would Grant say about this civil-service humbuggery? Why, sir, he would feel like organizing a new army to suppress it, if he could not do it otherwise.

And the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], following in the same strain, used the following language:

> General Grant denounced this civil service as a fraud in substance and effect, and was reelected President of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, what had become of the memory of the gentleman from Ohio when he made use of that expression? Had it taken a holiday, and left us simply the body in which that memory is ordinarily enshrined? Why, it is a matter of common history that it was under General Grant's Administration that the active agitation against the spoils system and in favor of the civil-service law was first inaugurated. Unless I am very much mistaken, it was under his Administration and by his direction, and not simply by his approval and consent, that Postmaster-General James took hold of that pesthouse of spoils, the post-office of the city of New York, and by introducing and maintaining there the principles of civil-service reform, brought order out of chaos, and gave to that city such an efficient and honest administration of the office as it had never seen since the foundation of the Government. It was under the Administration of General Grant and by his direction that Chester A. Arthur, his collector of customs in the custom-house of New York, did the same work of purification for the custom-house that Mr. James had done for the post-office.

I want now to read brief extracts from two or three of the messages of President Grant, addressed to Congress, to show whether, if now living, he would "feel like organizing a new army to suppress this civil-service humbuggery," whether or not there is any truth in the idea which the language of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] was intended to convey, that General Grant denounced the civil service, and owed his election to the fact that he had so declared himself. In his annual message addressed to Congress, of date December 5, 1870, President Grant made use of the following language:

> Always favoring practical reforms, I respectfully call your attention to one abuse of long standing which I would like to see remedied by this Congress. * * * There is no duty which so embarrasses the Executive and heads of Departments as that of appointments, nor is there any such arduous, thankless labor imposed on Senators and Representatives as that of finding places for constituents. The present system does not secure the best men, and often not even fit men, for public office. The elevation and purification of the civil service of the Government will be hailed with approval by the whole people of the United States.

I commend these words to the young gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS] who yesterday made his maiden effort upon this floor.

Mr. LANDIS. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him just a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to his colleague?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. LANDIS. Does the present system secure the best men and the ablest men?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. The present system, wherever the hands of the spoilsmen who fought this law from the start are taken off of its machinery, always secures the best men [applause]; and wherever, sir, a bad man creeps into office or remains there under the present civil-service system, it is because some spoilsman who is out of sympathy with the law and who is intrusted with its administration undertakes to destroy its vitality and to bring it into disrepute.

Mr. LANDIS. Does the gentleman consider Mr. Albert Baker, the headsman in the Public Printing Bureau under Mr. Benedict, a civil-service reformer?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I do not know where he stands. The doors of reformation are open to every man who has been a spoilsman to come in and address himself to the work of righting the wrongs he has committed. Many men have done so, and the doors are open for others who desire to imitate their example.

Mr. LANDIS. I admit that that is true. Did the gentleman from Indiana look over the book that I presented to the House yesterday with the annotations made thereon?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. No; but I heard what the gentleman said in his speech concerning it, and after the very complete exposé of the spoils system in the Government Printing Office which the gentleman thus made, none the less complete because the gentleman made it unwittingly, or because he advised us to go back to that system now——

Mr. LANDIS. No; I do not.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana (continuing)—any feeble words that I might utter to show the enormities of the system would be purely a work of supererogation. [Applause.]

Mr. LANDIS. Do you think, then, that it is in harmony with the idea of the merit system to take the gentleman who made that record and reinstate him, after he has been kicked out as a spoilsman, and transfer him to the Treasury Department, and then take him into the work of the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. If that man has passed a civil-service examination, if he possesses the moral, intellectual, and physical capacity to perform his duties under the civil-service law, I would not shut the gates of progress against him and leave him out as the victim of spoilsmen. Very great progress has been made in this matter. Some of the brainiest men in this country who were opposed to the civil-service law have grown, by observing the practical operations of the law, to become its strongest advocates.

The Hon. Charles L. Jewett, one of the brightest lawyers in Indiana, now practicing law at New Albany, a man who represented that county as a Democrat in the lower house of the State legislature at the time when I represented Wayne County in the senate, a man who was once the chairman of the Democratic State central committee and for years the official head of the party organization in Indiana, and who was a spoilsman from the top of his head to the sole of his feet, having studied the subject in more recent years, has become convinced that he was wrong, and has lately addressed to me a letter announcing his belief in the principles of civil service, which letter I will ask permission of the House to print with my remarks when I come to revise them for the RECORD.

Mr. LANDIS. That is all right. But this man Baker never passed an examination.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Well, if he did not pass an examination under the civil-service law and is lacking in proper qualifications, both the spirit and the letter of the law open the way for his expulsion from the service.

Mr. LANDIS. And yet it was so enforced as to put Albert Baker and others in. I know that is true. [Loud applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. The law contains in itself——

Mr. LANDIS. Answer the question, yes or no.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Does the gentleman discover any disposition upon my part to shirk answering his question?

Mr. LANDIS. Not at all.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. If the gentleman has any idea that I lack the disposition to answer his question, I shall convince him to the contrary.

Mr. LANDIS. The question could be answered yes or no.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I say that I do not know anything about the man. I say if he is an unworthy man, such as the gentleman describes, there is a method prescribed both by the spirit and letter of the law by which he can be and ought to be driven out.

Mr. LANDIS. What do you think of a man, for instance, who will take the position that a woman is not entitled to hold a place under this Government because she was the widow of a Union soldier?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Why, I have not much respect for a man who will oppose a woman on that ground solely.

Mr. LANDIS. Now, that man made the annotation that I read yesterday, that he simply discharged this woman from the public service for that reason.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. That was done under your system. The spirit of the spoils system dictated it, and in citing this case you have but discredited the course which you are now asking us to take.

Mr. LANDIS. Not at all. That man was kicked out of the public service by Mr. Palmer, and he remained out for a few days, when he was taken in by this Civil Service Commission, and is now employed in the room of the Civil Service Commission, a trusted clerk.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Very well. Now, then, is that man competent to remain there as a public servant?

Mr. LANDIS. I do not think he is.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Very well. If you and those other gentlemen who desire to break down the civil-service law by carping criticism will raise your voices on this floor in denouncing such improper appointments and removals, will stand by the law and will go to the Chief Executive of the nation and demand that its administration be purified, and that the law be enforced in such instances you will accomplish something for the public good.

Mr. LANDIS. That is what we are trying to do. There are none of us here who propose to absolutely eliminate the principle of civil-service reform, but we ask you to take hold of such men as this man Baker and the thousands who have been put into this department because they were spoilsmen; apply the test, and if they do not stand the test drive them from the public service and put meritorious men in their places. [Applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. My answer to the gentleman is so plain that anybody on the floor except the gentleman can see it, and that is that the machinery of the civil-service law is sufficient to eliminate these unworthy men if you can sustain your charges. Gentlemen talk about their wanting to "reform" the law——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield a moment? The Chair desires to say that there must be no further demonstrations in the gallery.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. The gentleman has posed as one in favor of "reforming" the civil service, and he has told us that he wants to change the law by amendment, so that it will be in harmony with American institutions; that he wants to modify it so as to bring it back to the faith of the fathers. The gentleman has had some pretty pregnant evidence, from what I have read, as to what the faith of the fathers was in this matter.

What kind of "reformation" does the gentleman propose? He proposes the same kind of reformation of the civil-service law that is proposed by all who are "anxious to wound yet afraid to strike;" who dread the public sentiment throughout this country which favors the civil-service system and therefore dare not come out boldly, as does the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY], and declare themselves in favor of abolishing the system root and branch. On the other hand, these gentlemen are afraid of the spoilsmen who hold them by the throat, and they therefore pose as being in favor of "modification" of the law but not in favor of its total abolition.

What kind of a "modification" does the gentleman from Indiana propose? I tried to draw him out by questions when he had the floor yesterday. He evaded some of them; he equivocated upon others, and finally he produced a typewritten paper which he had doubtless evolved during the recess from his fertile brain, by the light of the midnight oil, and he read his declaration of principles! He wants to "reform" the civil-service law, how? By taking out of the classification over half of the offices now there. He wants to "reform" the civil-service law, how? By introducing the principle of rotation in office, which is the very corner stone on which the spoils system is based. He wants to "reform" the law, how? By abolishing the system of competitive examination, which is the very heart of the system itself.

Mr. LANDIS. I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. He wants to "reform" it in another way. According to the reluctant statement I drew from him, he wants to "reform" it by taking his appointees exclusively from those of his own political household. The gentleman is down on the record, and he can not deny it. You shall go, sir, to the people of Indiana upon the record you have made here, and I shall go upon the record that I have made. [Applause.]

Mr. LANDIS. With the gentleman's permission, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. My time is very brief, Mr. Chairman, and I have yielded to the gentleman much more readily than he did to me. I want to progress. I ask the gentleman not to interrupt me. I must not be interrupted by trifles. [Laughter.]

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I decline to be interrupted by the gentleman.

Mr. LANDIS. You dare not be interrupted.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. That sounds like the challenge of a pygmy to a giant. [Laughter.] And I pay myself no very high compliment when I say it.

Now, I ask to be permitted to proceed without further annoyance. General Grant said in his message which I was quoting when this unseemly interruption occurred:

> The elevation and purification of the civil service of the Government will be hailed with approval by the whole people of the United States.

Now, I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio to the fact that this declaration was made before General Grant was a candidate for reelection a second time and before he was elected the second time. It shows whether he denounced the civil service and whether he obtained his election by virtue of disparaging it.

On April 18, 1874, the civil-service law having been in the meantime placed on the statute books, largely through his recommendation and influence, General Grant addressed the following message to Congress:

> If sustained by Congress, then no doubt the rules can, after the experience gained, be so improved and enforced as to still more materially benefit the public service, and relieve the Executive, members of Congress, and the heads of Departments from influences prejudicial to a good administration. The rules, as they have heretofore been enforced, have resulted beneficially, as shown by the opinion of the members of the Cabinet and their subordinates in the Departments; and in this opinion I concur.

And in his annual message to Congress, December 7, 1874, the last one he addressed to Congress on this subject, this President who had advocated civil-service reform, who had urged the passage of a civil-service law, who had importuned Congress and brought all his influence to bear to get Congress to vote appropriations to sustain it, seeing that Congress, under the influence of the spoils, was going to be recreant to its duty, sent to it the following message:

> The rules adopted to improve the civil service of the Government have been adhered to as closely as has been practicable with the opposition which they have met.

Yes, sir; the spoilsmen always opposed them; have never acquiesced in them:

> The effect, I believe, has been beneficial upon the whole, and has tended to the elevation of the service.

Then, after thus indorsing the law and referring to its beneficent operations, General Grant said further on in his message that he was powerless either to maintain or extend it unless Congress would vote the necessary appropriations; and if they did not do so, he would take it as evidence that they did not wish the continuance of the system, and he would therefore have to abandon it. He did not abandon his convictions in favor of the system, for he carried these with him to his grave amid the agonies of Mount McGregor; but he surrendered to the overwhelming power of spoils in Congress—yes, sir, this indomitable soldier of the Republic, who never in all his life had delivered up his sword to any antagonist on the battlefield, while retaining his convictions unimpaired, was nevertheless compelled by the dominant power of the spoilsmen, the most selfish and merciless power that ever actuated human conduct, to abandon the civil-service law because he could not get sufficient appropriations for its maintenance.

Public sentiment was at that time hardly ripe for the reform. The day of its triumph was postponed until a more auspicious season. Fuller extracts from these messages, Mr. Chairman, will be inserted by me in the RECORD.

Now, the gentleman from Ohio, in the course of his remarks this morning, has referred to Mr. Garfield's position on this subject, and he has been as unfortunate there as in his references to other distinguished men. Mr. Garfield declared his open hostility to the spoils system. In a speech which he delivered in this very House on March 14, 1870, he used the following language:

> We press such appointments upon the Departments; we crowd the doors; we fill the corridors; Senators and Representatives throng the offices and bureaus until the public business is obstructed; the patience of officers is worn out, and sometimes, for fear of losing their places by our influence, they at last give way and appoint men not because they are fit for their positions, but because we ask it. There, Mr. Chairman, is, in my judgment, the true field for retrenchment and reform. I believe that we can, at almost half the present cost, manage all these Departments better than they are now managed, if we adopt a judicious system of civil service.
> * * * The Patent Office of the Interior Department has, during a whole year, been conducted in part on the plan I am here advocating. No man, so far as I know, has been appointed to service in the Bureau except on strict competitive examination.
> The result is that we see the management of the Patent Office marked with efficiency and economy. But what can a Department do, what can a bureau do, with the whole weight of Congressional influence pressing for the appointment of men because they are our friends? In this direction is the true line of statesmanship—the true path of economy. Let us take this great subject in hand, and it can be settled in a few weeks.

And in an article which he contributed to the Atlantic Monthly of July, 1877, he said:

> One-third of the working hours of Senators and Representatives is hardly sufficient to meet the demands made upon them in reference to appointments to office. * * *
>
> The present system * * * impairs the efficiency of the legislators; * * * it degrades the civil service; * * * it repels from the service those high and manly qualities which are so necessary to a pure and efficient administration; and, finally, it debauches the public mind by holding up public office as the reward of mere party zeal.
> To reform this service is one of the highest and most imperative duties of statesmanship.

Mr. Chairman, I put these lofty declarations of this noble statesman from Ohio against the feeble plea for public plunder made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] on this floor, and I ask every ambitious Representative here who desires to obtain time for thought and reflection on public questions by ridding himself of vassalage to this cruel and inexorable system which sentiment is the worthier, which one he would rather see ingrafted on the statute books of his country.

In his inaugural address Mr. Garfield, still following the same line of thought, used the following language:

> The civil service can never be placed on a satisfactory basis until it is regulated by law for the good of the service itself, for the protection of those who are intrusted with the appointing power against waste of time and obstruction to the public business caused by inordinate pressure for place, and for protection of incumbents against intrigue and wrong.

I am aware, Mr. Chairman, that in making these quotations from the utterances of distinguished men I fall under the ban of the displeasure of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio who told us the other day on this floor that when the time came to debate this question he trusted that gentlemen on each side would debate it on their own judgment, and not content themselves with simply quoting what somebody else had said. He told us that the statesmanship which merely cited what others had said was the same kind of statesmanship in which the parrot indulged when performing his morning ablutions. I confess I was a little surprised to hear such a statement from the gentleman from Ohio, for it is a notorious fact that he frequently interlards his speeches very liberally with quotations.

Why, sir, we find his unpublished speech, to which reference has been made, as well as speeches on the civil service which the gentleman has delivered during the present Congress, copiously filled with quotations; and the gentleman gave us notice only a few minutes ago that he would put into his speech just delivered by way of appendix, when he comes to revise it, quite a number of papers and documents. I am not going to complain of the gentleman because of his habit in this respect, for I submit to the House that it is highly possible that the more of his speeches he puts in quotation points and the less original matter he incorporates into them the more elevated they are likely to be in tone and the more acceptable they are likely to be in substance. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, what has this spoils system done? I will tell you, sir. It has gone into every township of this country, and has established there a few men, men of selfish purposes and cheap abilities, who thrust the better and more patriotic citizens aside and take entire control of the politics of the neighborhood. These men know how to control votes at the primaries and to manipulate the wires of a political convention for the success of any candidate whose elevation to office they desire. They are not always without political convictions, and some of them are infinitely better than the others, but, for the most part, they take an interest in politics for what there is in it for themselves rather than to promote the good of the community or to attain anything for the country.

If a man desired to run for Congress or any important position in his State, he can do so only by the consent and support of these gentlemen. If an intelligent, honest, and capable man, a man with high ambition for personal distinction and desirous of doing something for the good of his country, wishes their support, he can obtain it only upon the conditions they impose; he must promise to reward them with public office in return for their assistance. He must either abdicate his honorable ambition for the public service or else he must lay aside his self-respect, bid adieu to his manhood, and put a mortgage on his soul by making pledges embarrassing, if not dishonorable to himself, and which he can not possibly keep, if he succeeds in the election, without surrendering his opportunities for study and distinction, and proving recreant to the interests of all of the people.

He gets his nomination in such a way as this; and if he comes to Congress or to the Senate, he has scarcely taken the oath of office before he is unrelentingly bombarded with letters and importunities for the fulfillment of pledges which he has been compelled to make either expressly or impliedly. He is visited at the Capitol and waylaid and intercepted at every turn. He is followed to his boarding house, and the privacy of his life is constantly and ruthlessly invaded. If he seeks time and opportunity to investigate some great public question, in order to enable him to cast a vote upon the floor of the House for the public weal—a vote of which he will in future years feel proud—he is so handicapped and his time so occupied by these people that he is obliged to give up the effort in despair.

Now, what is a public man to do under these circumstances?

If such is the evil which you propose to extend by the repeal of the civil-service law, what protection will there be to the Senator or Representative who has promised and is under a solemn oath of office to discharge these high and imperative duties, in which, not simply a selfish few, but the great body of the American people are profoundly interested? But to return to the working of this pernicious system. It is wholly impartial in the infliction of its injuries. It gives to no particular class of public men a monopoly of its visitation. It takes the White House by storm, and importunes the Chief Executive persistently and unrelentingly, giving him but limited time to devote to more important and worthier matters. Indeed, sir, I have often wondered how the President ever gets time to reflect upon the grave public questions which constantly confront him, or to consult satisfactorily with his constitutional advisers. The pressure extends also to the heads of Departments and interferes with the working of the officials there, taking up the time which they need to familiarize themselves with the working of their bureaus and the direction of the same. And bad as all this now is, it is proposed to make it to an hundredfold worse, by repealing the very law which has lessened the evil and been the only protection which public officials have had against the aggression.

To sum it all up, the spoils system makes errand boys and office brokers of public men, consumes their time, impairs their opportunities for distinction and public achievements, and makes them hypocrites and cowards; it converts our contests at the polls into a disgraceful scramble for office instead of a dignified struggle over principles; it encourages selfishness and discourages patriotism; it makes men mercenary instead of noble; it creates bosses instead of statesmen; it debauches the public conscience and demoralizes the people, and lowers the standard of integrity, both in and out of office; it puts time-serving politicians of mediocre ability in high public place, and relegates the most intelligent, fearless, and capable men, who have a real capacity for public affairs, to the rear; it pillages our great municipalities, and makes either pure or economical government of them impossible; it brazenly assails and invades the Executive power of appointment conferred upon the President by the Constitution, and makes us contemptible, not only in our own sight, but also in the sight of the whole civilized world.

Hon. Carl Schurz, who has been assailed in language not altogether classic by the gentleman from Ohio, but who is amply able to defend himself, and therefore needs no defense by me, delivered an address at the annual meeting of the National Civil Service Reform League, at Washington, D. C., on the 12th day of December, 1895, in which he portrayed most graphically the effect of the spoils system upon the career of a Representative, and which, by leave of the House, I shall incorporate in the RECORD along with my remarks.

Mr. Chairman, if I were gifted with speech to five times what I now possess, I could not even begin to depict to you the countless evils which flow from this wretched system, which ought forever to be banished from American politics. And yet the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] says no greater scandal or outrage was ever perpetrated upon the fair name of the American people than at the beginning of the civil-service law, and that there was no necessity for greater efficiency or purer morals in the Departments at Washington or in the great bureaus in other cities at the time it was enacted.

Why, sir, this very lack of efficiency, this very dishonesty and lack of purity in the civil service, was the thing which so roused public sentiment that at last the Pendleton Act of 1883 was introduced into Congress and placed upon the statute books. Previous to the time that this law was passed, and when the gentleman says there was no necessity for greater efficiency or purer politics in the great cities of this country, the mighty city of New York had been in the hands of a corrupt and remorseless ring of political bandits who had plundered it without either conscience or limitation. William M. Tweed had been at the zenith of his power. The taxpayers had been robbed. Decency had been banished from the municipal government. And this, sir, was simply a fair example of what the spoils system had done in almost every great metropolis within the confines of what ought to be the greatest and the purest and most patriotic Republic of modern times.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] also tells us that the old conditions were infinitely better than the new. Why, any man who looks around for an instant can see the change and can see everywhere bristling refutations of such a statement as this. Who hears now of political assessments being levied and collected upon the officeholders to be used for party purposes? Who hears now of men paying out their money under a system of blackmail which they are powerless to resist—a tribute to the political bosses for the privilege of remaining in public position? The thing is unknown, and that disgraceful sight is forever banished, I trust, from all the Departments of the Government.

Sir, it is a mistake for gentlemen to assume upon this floor that the civil-service law is a dead letter and is not being enforced. The God's truth about the whole matter is that, generally speaking, it is being enforced. It is vindicating itself and is rapidly ridding the country of the pernicious influence of the spoils system. It is in the excepted cases that the wrong is being done—the instances where men who oppose the reform are appointed to administer it, and purposely attempt to destroy it and bring it into disrepute. President after President has eulogized the working and effect of the law. Cabinet officer after Cabinet officer has said that it was absolutely indispensable to the safe conduct of the business of their Departments. Bureau after bureau has attested its efficiency.

The trouble, I again repeat—I can not emphasize it too strongly—is not with the law itself, but grows out of the fact that it is administered too often by those who are not only out of sympathy with it, but who are its positive enemies, who got into the directing offices by virtue of the exercise of the constitutional right of appointment vested in the Chief Executive, which has to be confirmed by the Senate, and which appointments are, therefore, of necessity, not covered by the provisions of the law, and who are doing everything they can to antagonize it and to bring it into disrepute, to the end that they may bring about a state of public sentiment which will lead to its repeal and take us back again to the saturnalia and carnival of the spoils.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in the time that remains to me, I want to take up some of the objections that have been urged to the civil-service law and to dispose of them as best I can.

Objection is made in the first place to the character of the examinations that are had. My friend from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS] spent quite a long time yesterday in the course of his remarks in reading questions which he claimed were propounded to applicants for appointment under the civil-service law and which he claimed were absurd. He was full of carping criticisms upon that subject.

Now, what are the facts about the character of the examinations? Both the spirit and the letter of the law provides, and in almost every instance the practice carries out the provision, that these examinations shall be practical in their character. The questions are drawn up by the chief examiner after consultation with the head of the Department for a place in which the applicant is to be examined, and, after meeting his approval, and being approved also by the Civil Service Commission, they are used in order to test the fitness of the applicant in competitive examination.

It seems to have been the stock in trade of a number of gentlemen to misrepresent the character of these questions and to ridicule them. Over and over again it has been demonstrated that these criticisms were unjust and that the questions propounded were proper and reasonable ones. The gentleman from Indiana should take warning by the humiliating exposure which was visited upon Senator GALLINGER, who, in an unguarded moment, made the statement, in attempting to ridicule the examinations of the Civil Service Commission, that in order to obtain a position in the Government Printing Office an applicant was required to hop a certain distance on one foot as a part of his examination. He should remember the merciless excoriation which Mr. Carl Schurz visited upon Senator GALLINGER, and the fact therein clearly shown that this test was not applied in examinations for admission to the Government Printing Office at all, but to the Railway Mail Service and other departments in the Government service where great physical endurance was required, and that the test in question was the one uniformly applied by physicians in order to discover the presence of organic disease of the heart.

I do not envy the mental constitution of gentlemen who have such a genius for small things that they hunt up here and there a little question which is irrelevant and urge it against the system. It would be a surprising thing if in the thousands of questions propounded there could not be found a question now and then that was irrelevant or even foolish. But one might just as well find fault with the entire planetary system because a few spots are apparent upon the face of the sun as to denounce the civil-service examination because it appears that at some place along the line a question or so is found which seems trivial or irrelevant. The object of the examination is to give to the Government the best equipped man for the public service. This the competitive system does. In this it has demonstrated its vast superiority over what is known as the pass or departmental examination, which is purely noncompetitive.

Now, as to those gentlemen who want rotation in office. The gentleman from Ohio tells us that our county officers are elected for stated terms. That is true; they are. And it is also a fact that very frequently, there being several candidates, the man who is the most popular and the least qualified is elected to the office and runs the office by his deputy, and he not infrequently turns out to be a defaulter. I am not asking for an extension of the civil-service laws to these offices, even if State constitutions and laws admit of it; but it might well be questioned whether it might not be to the interest, not of the few who want these offices, but to the interest of all the people of the county, if there could be some civil-service test applied to the candidates whereby, through a competitive examination, the best men could be selected to fill them, and then, the salaries having been reduced to a reasonable amount, the successful applicants hold them as long as they possess the intellectual, physical, and moral qualifications necessary for their proper administration.

Gentlemen forget the Supreme Court of the United States and the Federal judges of the circuit and district courts, the cadets at Annapolis and at West Point. Why not turn out these judges and officers every few years in order that the "American" idea of rotation in office may prevail? Look at the absurdity of such a proposition!

My friend from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS] ought, in the efflorescence of his maiden effort yesterday, to have taken out his pencil and paper pad and figured up how long a period it would require until each one of the 70,000,000 people in this country could get into one of the 200,000 offices within our gift. Rotation in office! Why the thing is an absurdity, an impossibility!

What man in the ordinary conduct of his business would turn out his tried and faithful employees every three or four years in order to give somebody an opportunity to enjoy this idea of rotation in office? And if the individual can not afford to do this, how can the Government afford to do it? The man would simply be a fool or an idiot, and his business would soon go to pieces if he did this. And, a fortiori, the Government would be the loser by such a policy. Take, if you please, a banking institution, by way of illustration. The stockholders get into a conflict of opinion as to what shall be the financial policy of the bank. At a stockholders' election faction No. 1 succeeds. The first thing it does is to turn out not simply the board of directors and the president and cashier, but also the bookkeepers and clerks and messengers that are running the business properly simply because they are in sympathy with the other faction.

What would be the effect upon the business of the bank? After a while the time comes when the stockholders hold another election, and this time faction No. 2 prevails, and it, in turn, makes a clean sweep of the entire force of the bank from top to bottom, removing the officers and employees who have just about begun to fairly understand their business and putting untried men in their places because they are adherents of the prevailing faction. How would you like to deposit with this bank? How long would it be until incompetency and dishonesty would do its work and the institution be wrecked? And yet you are proposing to pursue this very policy in the conduct of the affairs of this Government.

Why not apply the same principle to the public service as to private enterprises? Why should this Government turn men out of position when they have proven their honesty and efficiency? Why should they remove tried public servants when economic reasons demand that they should be kept in offices they have demonstrated their capacity to fill?

I do not believe in the doctrine of rotation in office. I do not think it can possibly have a place in any sensible civil-service system in this country. The species of rotation in office which these gentlemen favor is that we shall have no competitive examinations, that men shall not be put in office regardless of politics, but that the offices shall rotate from the spoilsmen of one party to the spoilsmen of the other party just as, in the mutation of politics, this party goes out and the other comes into office. There is to be simply a close corporation of the spoilsmen, the people at large not even being taken into account. Sir, I believe in a system which keeps a man in office so long as he has the physical, mental, and moral qualifications to discharge the duties of the office, and which, under the form of competitive examination such as the civil-service law affords, gives to every man in the country equal right and equal opportunity to compete for public employment and to enjoy its emoluments.

But these gentlemen say that we are going to create a life tenure of office. That is not true. No civil-service reformer ever advocated any such thing. We have life tenure under the civil-service system just as a private individual has a life tenure for his employees. As long as a man is intelligent and capable, as long as he has the mental, moral, and physical equipment to perform the duties of the office, he is kept in it, and that is the whole extent to which a life tenure is advocated by civil-service reformers. You can not have a proper administration of the civil service upon any other plan. Rotation in office is the basic principle of the spoils system. It is the grappling iron with which the spoilsmen seek to drag down the whole of the present structure. Once admit the doctrine of rotation in office and you have destroyed the whole fabric of the civil service itself beyond the power of restoration.

But, Mr. Chairman, it is insisted that after this life tenure of service we are to have a civil pension list. It is said that this is the legitimate result of the civil-service system, and that this appears by the experience of England. But those who so argue forget that this Government of ours is an improvement upon the British Government. They forget that we go a certain distance in copying British institutions and then stop short, according to the peculiarities of our condition. The executive power of Great Britain, for instance, is vested in a king who rules for life and transmits his title to his descendants.

Our executive feature was copied from the British system to the extent of putting it in a single head; but he is called the President and is elected every four years. Again, the mother country has a House of Lords composed of peers created by patents from the King, some of which are inheritable, and all of which, I believe, endure for life. We vest our conservative legislative power in the Senate of the United States, the members of which are elected by the people through their legislatures every six years.
